Crackdown goes on

Gov't says no abuses in what's described as 'state of confusion'

MALACAÑANG yesterday sought to allay fears of rights abuse in the ongoing crackdown on Abu Sayyaf members and supporters in the South, which the Commission on Human Rights (CHR) in Western Mindanao described as "Gestapo type."

Presidental spokesperson Rigoberto Tiglao said the crackdown would last for a month or as long as necessary to dismantle the Abu Sayyaf.

President Macapagal-Arroyo said on radio that rules were in place to protect the human rights of those arrested. Tiglao denied that the military raided mosques in Basilan at the start of the crackdown early Friday.

"The Department of Justice has issued guidelines on how to carry out the arrest... The regulations are there so that it won't be said that human rights were violated," Reuters quoted the President as saying in an interview with radio dzAR.

The rules include the need to file appropriate cases against the suspects within 36 hours. The suspects are to be released immediately if this cannot be done.

Reuters quoted Justice Secretary Hernando Perez as saying that 38 people had been arrested in Sulu and Basilan, and that charges ranging from kidnapping, harboring and aiding of criminals were being readied. Tiglao placed the number at 71 as of 1 p.m. yesterday.

But lawyer Jose Manuel Mamaug, CHR director for Western Mindanao, said the arrests were illegal.

"(The suspects) were treated like criminals and were arrested without warrants," he said.

The President said Friday that the necessary warrants for the arrests had been secured.

At yesterday's press forum at the Sulo Hotel in Quezon City, Senate President Aquilino Pimentel urged the military to end as soon as possible the "state of confusion" in the South to prevent rights abuse.

"Obviously, the sooner this state of uncertainty is over, the better. There could really be abuses under such circumstances," he said, adding:

"I have already issued an appeal to the military to be extremely cautious. This is obviously a cause of great concern."

Pimentel said he had learned that the military was hunting down a certain Ibrahim Rasul, and noted that this person could be mistaken for former ambassador Abraham Rasul, who is in his 80s.

He said he had also received reports that some people "who are completely innocent" had been picked up.

Pimentel said the fact that authorities could just enter houses and arrest people without telling their families where they WALK in the park or spin dreams in the shady lanes of Mehan Gardens even as it is now but a wan image of its historic past when it was perfumed by hundreds of tropical blooms and was a tourist destination in every guidebook of Manila.

JESS YUSON

Once upon a Sunday in Mehan

BY JOHN L. SILVA

ONCE upon a Sunday, one could stroll in the shady lanes of Mehan Gardens and spin dreams in the heady fragrance of prized blossoms from all over the world.

From the turn of the 20th century until the beginning of World War II, the botanical garden near Manila City Hall was featured as a tourist destination in every guidebook of the city.

It was once a popular recreation center, eclipsing nearby Luneta on Monday evenings when the Constabulary Band played there and large crowds gathered to hear the music and while away nights perfumed by tropical blossoms.

The Orchidarium in the National Museum Complex in Manila harks back to Mehan garden in its prime: a manicured garden, towering trees and hundreds of orchid varieties.

It is a contemporary remembrance of the old garden—now a wan image of its brilliantly hued past—that Manila Mayor Lito Atienza appears intent on burying in a grave of cement.

Although Atienza has lost the first round in his campaign to build a new city college on the grounds of the Mehan Gardens, it's a muted victory for environmentalists and conservationists who have been crusading to save the historical site.

In the past week, news reports have exposed the mayor's attempt to construct a park-and-ride building (see story in Metro, P.B.I.) in the northern section of Mehan Gardens and his intention to build a teacher's dormitory in nearby Arroceros Park.

His plans have struck an angry chord among those who believe that he will be bulldozing soil rich in heritage.

In 1858, the distinguished Barcelona botanist Sebastian Vidal y Soler, a prolific scholar on almost every facet of Philippine plant life, created what would be later known as the Mehan Garden.

The Spanish botanist's research titles alone were a mouthful—for instance, "Phanerogamas Cummingianae Philippinarum o indice numerico y Catalogo sistematico de las plantas fanerogamas coleccionadas en Filipinas por Hugh Cumming con caracteristicas de algunas especies no descriptas y del genero Cummingia (malvaceas)."

Vidal outlined a rectangular corridor on the eastern side of Intramuros and established the Jardin Botanico, planting rows

BY RALPH GRAVES
Former Editorial Director,
Time Magazine

I RETURNED to Brent School last March—60 years after my high school graduation. I decided it was too great a distance to travel from my home in Manhattan all the way to Baguio in Northern Luzon, so at first I turned down the invitation.

But the Headmaster Don Holmes, a tall, energetic Australian with great enthusiasm for my old school, persuaded me that I ought to come. Since I was one of the oldest surviving alumni, Don Holmes convinced me I should come and take part in the event.

Brent was the best school I ever attended and that includes both Williams and Harvard.

While at Brent, I would be his guest in the Headmaster's house in Baguio. While in Manila before and after Baguio, I would be the guest of Marsh Thomson, a prominent American businessman and former chair of Brent's board of trustees. An important ceremony would take place, the unveiling of the statue of Bishop Brent, founder of the school.

Like a large part of the world (and a very large part of the Philippines), Baguio has undergone strenuous development. The beautiful forest of pines has become a for-

It's payback time for UP graduates

BY BLANCHE S. RIVERA

FRUSTRATED, volunteer teacher Edwin Soriano stood surveying his listless students—some anticipating the next day's fishing trip that meant food for the family, others nodding off to sleep, still others scribbling lyrics of the latest hit song.

He had labored over his lesson plan for the children of Cuyo, a small town in Palawan, but his class appeared loath to spare him even an hour.

"People thought I was going to give up," said Soriano, among the first batch of volunteers of the University of the Philippines' Gurong Pahinungod program. "But when you look into the eyes of your students, you are inspired to go on."

Soriano and many other UP graduates are teaching public school children in far-flung provinces identified by the education department.

Armed with diplomas in various courses that could open the doors to "better" lives, they are devoting an academic year in the under-served provinces.

The UP graduates personify the concept of the Pahinungod, a Cebuano term that is the closest equivalent of the Oblation, a symbol of offering to the nation. The statue stands in every UP campus as a reminder to resident scholars to give back to the country what they have received.

They get paid a measly P5,000 monthly, part of which they use to buy teaching mate-

Ombudsman confirms Jimenez to testify vs Erap

BY MICHAEL LIM UBAC
AND CATHY C. YAMSUAN

MANILA Rep. Mark Jimenez will take the witness stand during Joseph Estrada's upcoming plunder trial to testify that the deposed President owned a controversial P3.2-billion account under the alias "Jose Velarde." Overall Deputy Ombudsman Margarita Gervacio said yesterday.

Ombudsman Antonio Desiderio, the chief prosecutor in the plunder case, said Jimenez, with corroboration from former Equitable PCI-Bank officers Clarissa Ocampo and Manuel Curato, would prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Velarde account belonged to Estrada.

Jimenez, a former member of Estrada's notorious "midnight Cabinet," is also instrumental in strengthening new plunder-related charges to be filed by the Ombudsman against Estrada and his co-accused, Gervacio said.

It is still unclear what effect, if any, the congressman's new role as a state witness will have on the United States' request for his extradition.

Jimenez claims that he already falls under the government's Witness Protection Program since he has agreed to testify against Estrada. But Justice Secretary Hernando Perez has said that his department is still evaluating Jimenez's statements.

Gervacio said Estrada's one-time adviser on Latin American affairs would corroborate his affidavit, submitted to the justice department and forwarded to the Ombudsman, claiming that Estrada plundered the nation's coffers through kickbacks and commissions.

In the affidavit, Jimenez alleged that Estrada coerced him to fork over personal loans of more than P346 million. He said Estrada did not pay him back. About P20 million of the amount, mostly drawn from Jimenez's account at the Bank of Commerce, was deposited into the Velarde account at the Equitable PCI-Bank, the congressman claimed.

The newest plunder charges will also focus on Jimenez's allegation that he gave Estrada another P127 million as an advance or a loan, Gervacio said.

In his affidavit, Jimenez confirmed a claim made by former Belle Resources Corp. vice chair William Ociel that the company gave P189.7 million to Estrada as a commission for ordering the Government Service Insurance System and the Social Security System to purchase Belle stock.

Whose side are you on, human rights lawyer asked

THE PRESIDENTIAL Commission on Good Government has asked lawyer Romeo Capulong to explain which side he is on in the battle against the Marcoses and their cronies.

PCGG Commissioner Ruben Carranza Jr. said Capulong, lawyer for a group of human rights victims of the Marcos regime, should explain why he is also representing a former Marcos crony whose assets have been sequestered by the government.

Carranza said the PCGG learned recently that Capulong is the counsel for Don Ferry, who along with Lucio Tan, is a defendant in a case pending at the Sandiganbayan.

Ferry is also Tan's co-petitioner in asking the anti-graft court to make the PCGG show them the documents in its possession that would justify the resequestration of their assets.

"It was Capulong who filed the petition for Don Ferry," Carranza said. "It puzzles us why he did not say anything about that." Blanche S. Rivera

Wartime 'sex slaves' compensated

THE HAGUE—The Japanese Asian Women Fund (AWF) has paid out compensation to 78 Dutch women who were forced into sexual slavery by the Japanese military during World War II, the foundation announced here Friday.

Seventy-eight survivors from an estimated 200 to 300 who were forced to become so-called "comfort women" received $19,300 (P1.02 million) each.

The women had been forced to be prostitutes for the Japanese Army during the wartime occupation of Indonesia, then a Dutch colony.

The AWF is funded partly by the Japanese government and partly by donations from Japanese citizens, former soldiers and their families. The money for the project in the Netherlands came from the Japanese government, Marguerite Hamer, a spokeswoman for the project, said. AFP

Estrada friend and businessman Jaime Dichaves allegedly gave the then President the commission.

Promised

"According to Mark Jimenez, Estrada promised to pay the (P127-million) loan upon receiving his commission from Belle (Resources). But there was no payment," Gervacio said.

The alleged P189.7-million transaction is one of four instances in which Estrada is accused of having committed plunder—the basis of the Ombudsman's plunder complaint against the jailed ex-President, who also faces the lesser charges of perjury and illegal use of an alias.

A Manila judge has allowed Jimenez to post a P1-million bail bond for his temporary liberty while the court hears the extradition case lodged against him by the DOJ on behalf of the US government, which has sought a court order canceling the bail.

The Manila congresswoman, a former US resident, is wanted by the state of Florida for conspiracy to defraud the US government, illegal campaign contributions to the Democratic Party, tax evasion and wire fraud.

Perez in corner

In another aspect of the plunder case, Estrada's lawyer Rene Saguisag has found an opportunity to push Perez into a corner for saying that former Justice Secretary Serafin Cuevas is prohibited from representing Estrada in court.

Saguisag said that if Perez insists on objecting to Cuevas as a member of the defense team, he is in effect admitting that Estrada remains President.

Perez has cited a provision in Republic Act 910 that bars a retired justice receiving a state pension from representing government officials in criminal cases where the government is the adverse party.

Perez said that if Cuevas, a retired Court of Appeals justice, accepts a regular pension from the government, he is covered by the prohibition. Cuevas is also a former justice of the Supreme Court, but he resigned his post under the Aquino administration.

The newest plunder charges will also focus on Jimenez's allegation that he gave Estrada another P127 million as an advance or a loan, Gervacio said.

In his affidavit, Jimenez confirmed a claim made by former Belle Resources Corp. vice chair William Ociel that the company gave P189.7 million to Estrada as a commission for ordering the Government Service Insurance System and the Social Security System to purchase Belle stock.

Mike won't do a Loi or Hillary

FIRST Gentleman Jose Miguel "Mike" Arroyo is not running for senator.

Take it from President Macapagal-Arroyo, who made this firm declaration yesterday when asked in a radio interview about her husband's high-profile charity and social work.

In the interview on NBC-Angel

Radyo, she was asked if Mr. Arroyo's charity work would lead to a senatorial bid. The answer was a flat "no."

The President said charity work—and the media exposure that goes with it—had always been part of the high-profile role of the President's spouse. Juliet L. Javellana

Now, get NBI clearances in one day

BEGINNING Monday, the National Bureau of Investigation will shorten the time it takes to obtain an NBI clearance.

The agency announced the new system would allow applicants for clearance to get it on the day they applied for it.

The new one-day system is part of an ambitious computerization program aimed at reducing the agency's backlog of clearances, NBI Director Reynaldo Wyco said.

For now, however, the new system will be available only at the NBI main office on Taft Avenue, Manila, Wyco said.

He said the new process would benefit some 8,000 to 10,000 applicants who apply for NBI clearances daily.

Lawyer Samuel Ong, NBI deputy director for intelligence operations, said the system will be implemented soon in 10 satellite clearance centers across the country.

These are in the cities of Cebu, Batangas, Naga, Baguio, Cotabato, Dagupan, Cagayan de Oro, Davao, Zamboanga and Illoilo. Michael Lim Ubac

ous souls" of leaders of the Employers Confederation of the Philippines and the Philippine Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

The KMU is hoping that the power of prayer will open the minds of employers—and their checkboxes, too.

The two business groups earlier threatened to fire workers who would join a KMU-sponsored mass leave on June 23 when President Macapagal-Arroyo delivers her State of the Nation Address.

On the same day, the KMU plans to hold a big rally to pressure Ms Macapagal into supporting its demand for a legislated wage.

"Ecop and PCCI will be better off letting their workers take a one-day leave and join the rally demanding a P125 wage hike," said KMU spokesman Sammy Malunes.

If prayers do not cause a change of heart among employers, labor unrest in the country will only worsen, according to Malunes.

He said workers were having a hard time making ends meet with the minimum wage in Metro Manila, for example, pegged at P250 a day.

Studies show that a family of five must earn at least P500 a day to pay for food and other basic needs.

Employers, however, warned that increasing the minimum wage by P125 would only force more companies either to shut down or layoff workers.

In fact, according to the labor department, many companies can't afford to pay their workers the existing minimum wage.

In Northern Mindanao, for instance, at least 200 companies were found to be violating the minimum wage law.

"We have to weigh this (demand for a P125 increase in the minimum wage) very carefully because definitely business could not afford another pay hike," Alan Macaraya, the labor department's director for Northern Mindanao, said in Cagayan de Oro City.

Macaraya said 14 firms had closed shop this year because of the bleak business climate in the region.

He said the loss of export markets, high cost of production and the weak peso were the main reasons cited by the companies for shutting down.

"There must be judicious balance that would address the needs of the workers and business sector," he said.

Wage Order No. 8 passed last year granted workers in the region a P173 daily minimum wage and a P7 daily allowance.

Macaraya said a P125 wage increase would mean an additional P3 million in operating cost for a company employing at least 100 workers.

"That is simply too much for small and medium enterprises," he said.

Banker Arsenio Sebastian, business representative in the Northern Mindanao Regional Tripartite Wage and Productivity Board, estimates that a P500 "decent wage" reflects the cost of living in Metro Manila but not in the provinces. With report from Froilan Gallardo, PDI Mindanao Bureau

THE DAILY GOSPEL

1st Reading: Dt 30:10-14

For you shall turn to Yahweh, your God, with all your heart and with all your soul, and observe his commandments and norms, in a word, everything written in this book of the Law.

These commandments that I give you today are neither too high nor too far for you. They are not in heaven that you should say: "Who will go up to heaven to get these commandments that we may hear them and put them into practice." Neither are they at the other side of the sea for you to say: "Who will cross to the other side and bring them to us, that we may hear them and put them into practice."

On the contrary, my word is very near you; it is already in your mouth and in your heart, so that you can put it into practice.

2nd Reading: Col 1:15-20

He is the image of the unseen God, and for all creation he is the firstborn, for in him all things were created, in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible: thrones, rulers, authorities, powers... All was made through him and for him. He is before all and all things hold together in him.

And he is the head of the body, that is the Church, for he is the first, the first raised from the dead that he may be the first in everything, for God was pleased to let nothing dwell in him.

Through him God willed to reconcile all things to himself, and through him, through his blood shed on the cross.

God establishes peace, on earth as in heaven.

Gospel: Lk 10:25-37

A teacher of the Law came and began putting Jesus to the test. And he said, "Master, what shall I do to receive eternal life?" Jesus replied, "What is written in the Scripture? How do you understand it?" The man answered, "It is written: You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your strength and with all your mind. And you shall love your neighbor as yourself." Jesus replied, "What a good answer! Do this and you shall live." The man wanted to keep up appearances, so he replied, "Who is my neighbor?"

Jesus then said, "There was a man going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and he fell into the hands of robbers. They stripped him, beat him and went off leaving him half-dead.

It happened that a priest was going along that road and saw the man, but passed by on the other side. Likewise a Levite saw the man and passed by on the other side. But a Samaritan, too, was going that way, and when he came upon the man, he was moved with compassion. He went over to him and treated his wounds with oil and wine and wrapped them with bandages. Then he put him on his own mount and brought him to an inn where he took care of him.

The next day he had to set off, but he gave two silver coins to the innkeeper and told him: "Take care of him and whatever you spend on him, I will repay when I come back."

Jesus then asked, "Which of these three, do you think, made himself neighbor to the man who fell into the hands of robbers?" The teacher of the Law answered, "The one who had mercy on him." And Jesus said, "Go then and do the same."

Commentary:

Today's Gospel recounts one of Luke's most famous parables that was used to invite a lawyer to interpret the Law correctly. At stake is the correct interpretation of the double commandment to love God and neighbor, and with it the quest for eternal life. The parable is purposely placed between the question of the lawyer, "what must I do to inherit eternal life?" and the new discovery of the same person "the one who showed him mercy." Jesus points out that the actual practice of mercy is the only correct interpretation of the law that opens the way to eternal life. The reading concludes with the instruction, "Go and do likewise."

Father, we meet so many people every day that we grow callous in our relation with them. Grant us the awareness that we are all your beloved children.

Why Mark Jimenez?

THE NEWLY elected representative of the sixth district of Manila wants to know why the Macapagal administration is bent on pushing the extradition case against him. Doesn't the government already have enough on its hands? he asked during a lunch he hosted for the press last Thursday. There are economic problems to attend to, and law and order problems to solve.

He is right, of course—except that he got one small detail wrong. He is a law and order problem. And if the government mismanages his case, he becomes an economic one.

At least the man who was once described by deposed President Joseph Estrada as a "corporate genius" knows his limitations. He knows he is no rocket scientist. "You do not need to be a rocket scientist to know that things are now convoluted in this country. What is wrong is now right and what is right is now wrong," he told the media.

Like everyone familiar with the events of the last three years, we wonder what Jimenez, born Mario Batacan Crespo, really meant by that. That the "unconvoluted" days of winning more than P100 million at the casino in one spectacular week are over? That the "right" time when mysterious brokers can earn a fantastic commission on business decisions of government financial institutions has passed? Or that the high moral age when national newspapers are bought by dummies is now at an end?

As it turns out, what Jimenez meant the other day was simply this: the government has lost focus because it was paying his case too much attention. In fact, Jimenez added, the government does not have its priorities straight.

"Like in Mindanao, for example. Why is the government spending millions on freeing the hostages (of the Abu Sayyaf) when 75 million Filipinos are (held) hostage by poverty?"

Like the man himself, this quote is just too rich. We almost don't know where to start.

Did he mean ransom payments as official government policy? That happened during the Estrada administration, of which the former presidential adviser for Latin American affairs was a part. Did he mean the expensive military pursuit operations now ongoing in Basilan? The government today has wide public support for its all-out war on the bandits. If the war is lost, then peace and order problems will escalate and economic recovery will be stuck in the Basilan mud. Or did he mean exclusive government attention on poverty alleviation? It does not take a corporate genius to know that different agencies of the government have different functions, and different budgets with which to fund those functions.

What is the real issue here? Jimenez is a fugitive from American justice, and the US government issued a warrant for his arrest in April 1999. We have an extradition treaty with the United States, in place since 1993. Under that treaty, we have an obligation to extradite to the United States any person Washington seeks to bring to justice. Jimenez has been charged, and now faces arrest for leaving US jurisdiction; this does not mean, however, that he has already been found guilty. It only means that he has to stand trial.

Consider the opposite. If Manila were to prosecute Estrada crony Charlie "Atong" Ang to the full extent of the law, it must first ask the US government to extradite Ang. Under the treaty, the United States is obliged to send him back to the Philippines. But if Manila fails to answer the standing US request for Jimenez's extradition, why would the Americans honor an agreement we ourselves have breached?

The Jimenez extradition case is eminently a law and order problem. There is a fugitive, there is an extradition treaty, there is an extradition request. But if the government cannot enforce the law, or meet an international legal obligation, then the high-profile Jimenez case can quickly become an economic problem.

It is a fact that investments flow into those areas where the rule of law holds sway. Investors, after all, want to be able to operate in predictable regimes, where contracts are honored and obligations are met. It does not take a rocket scientist, or a corporate genius, to know that.

Save the Mehan Gardens!

SEPARATE OPINION

Isagani
A. Cruz

ONE of the fond memories of my boyhood is of the many hours I spent at the Mehan Gardens during the years before the outbreak and trauma of World War II. It was a more sedate era then, without the hustle and bustle of the present metropolis. The most peaceful place in Manila was the Mehan Gardens.

When my older brother Virgilio and I were still tots and could not go out by ourselves, our father used to bring us to the Mehan Gardens, primarily so we could enjoy the zoo. Taking us out to places that would interest us or to the serial movies like "The Adventures of Frank Merriwell" that showed two chapters a week, was one of our father's ways of bonding with us. Our mother did not go with us because she had to take care at home of our three sisters, Ada, Laura and Violeta, and later of our youngest brother Vicente Jr. During those occasions that she took us out with her, it was usually to church.

It was at the Mehan Gardens that we first saw in the flesh those untamed animals, including the elephants, lions and crocodiles that we had seen before only in the Tarzan films starring Johnny Weissmuller. That first time was an unforgettable experience, our father was delighted at our amazement. He probably also noticed that we weren't interested at all in Maureen O'Sullivan as Jane in her skimpy costume. But that would come later, of course.

Although I was thrilled by the sight of those unfamiliar beasts, I could not help thinking that it was cruel to confine them in such small cages when they could have had full room of the vast jungles where they had been captured. Moreover, their offspring in captivity, while relatively safe from the hungry predators of the wild, would not be born free. Even at my young age then, I already had liberal views against illegal detention albeit, as yet, only for the animals.

As I grew older and learned to venture out on my own, I fell into the habit of going to the National Library at the basement of the old Legislative Building on P. Burgos Avenue which now houses the National Museum. It was just a stone's throw from the City Hall of Manila, then a dilapidated creaky wooden building to be eventually replaced by the present edifice, grown also decrepit through years of misuse and neglect. After the war, there were not many "automobiles" in Manila before the war, and the common means of transportation were the Meralco and Pastranca buses, the streetcars, and the innumerable caleas and carretelas. The cochero was king of the road and protected by the local politicos. There was also a growing number of autocabs, as they were called, eventually to evolve into the jeepney that would replace the calefa after the war. The taxicabs were mostly for the rich, if they did not own "berlinas" or hired them from the "garage," the predecessor of the rent-a-car company.

If one wanted a brief respite from the racket of the city, what he could do was seek refuge in the Mehan Gardens. This was what I often did although not for escape because I was not really much bothered by all that noise, being then an unflappable young man. I went to the garden simply because I liked its atmosphere and ambience. The now-familiar animals were old and faithful friends, remembered from my childhood. The plants and trees were silent companions, adorning the whole place like petrified poems. I confess, though, that I did not notice the flowers, which must have abundantly embroidered the verdure with their blaze of brilliant colors in a purity of loveliness.

The Mehan Gardens was especially magical during lazy afternoons in summer, when I often found pleasure in its tranquility, many times with a friend or two exploring romantic possibilities or ponderously examining the meaning of life. There were no limits to our young imagination. If I went there with no one to talk to, I would spend the lonely hours meditating on the problems of the world, daydreaming about an unrequited love (for some Hollywood star), or simply whiling away the time watching sweethearts relishing each other's company on a nearby park bench from where I would be sitting.

It was really an innocent time. While relaxing at the Mehan Gardens, no one approached you for alms or to sell chicharrones or peanuts, and neither were there chiselers around to threaten you with an ice pick if you did not come across with a coin or two. Drug addiction was practically nonexistent; people wore decent clothes and did not dye their hair in outlandish shades. And the Mehan Gardens was clean—that I can remember clearly—with sweepers diligently tending to their duties to make the whole place a truly spotless park the people of Manila could cherish.

My friend Bambi L. Harper on the opposite page and the other conservationists have reason to deplore—and resist—the attempt of Mayor Lito Atienza to destroy yet another historic landmark of Manila that used to give its residents immense pleasure and pride. I join them in condemning the plan to convert the Mehan Gardens into a construction site and deprive the Filipino people of a valuable cultural heritage gilded by memories of a graceful past when beauty was more valuable than modernity or progress.

Concrete love

MOMENTS

Fr. Jerry
M. Orbos, SVD

THERE is no truth to the rumor that Good Samaritans can only come from Samar. In fact the whole message of today's Gospel (Lk. 10: 25-37) is that anyone of us and all of us can and should be Good Samaritans anywhere, anytime, in whatever situation.

Last week, a seaman dropped by my office with his wife and their 2-year-old baby. He came to ask for a blessing before boarding ship once again. After 20 years he had wanted to retire, he said, but he encountered something in the last ship he boarded which made him decide to board ship one or two more times.

According to him, the crew of the last ship he boarded prayed the rosary nightly. He did not know who started it, but the effect on the crew was very positive. They experienced less friction among themselves, and they were less lonely and afraid on board. Now, he would like to start this nightly rosary on the next ship he would be boarding, and maybe on the next one or two more. This he would do, he said, in gratitude for God's blessings, and to help somehow his fellow seamen encounter and find God in their difficult and lonely work.

This man, for me is a Good Samaritan involved in concrete love, on the high seas.

Another Good Samaritan I encountered is a Japanese businessman named Mitsushige Horii. He was the one who discovered former Saipan Gov. Larry Guerrero who had a stroke in his hotel room June last year. This Japanese brought the governor to the hospital, called his family in Saipan, and stayed with him until a member of his family arrived.

When I went to the San Juan de Dios Hospital, I saw him by the bed, stroking Guerrero's arms in a most concerned way. He was neither a relative nor a fellow countryman, but here was a Good Samaritan expressing concrete love in a foreign land.

There's really no way of telling where or when God will call us to be Good Samaritans. One time, I was rushing to my noontime radio program at Veritas when I saw a thin and shaggy-looking man writhing in pain on the sidewalk of Bailete Drive. He was holding his stomach, gasping for air. My first impulse was to get going because I was going to be late if I stopped. But my conscience told me to get involved with this person who needed my concrete love in that here and now.

I turned around, got down and gave him some money. But, he said, he needed a pain reliever for his ulcers. Now I was surely going to be late, I said to myself, almost regretting that I stopped. But I ended up going back to our seminary to get some medicines and then going back to the man who had not moved at all from where he was.

I gave him the medicines, said goodbye, and drove on with that "Good Samaritan feeling." I was late for the program, but I had great joy in sharing what I just encountered.

But now, when I look back, I have a tinge of regret. I could have done more. Did I really love with all my strength, with all my heart, with all my mind? Perhaps I could have given him water with the medicine, or I could have brought him to a hospital or spent more time with him. In other words, I could have been a better Samaritan.

No, love and involvement are never enough. No wonder many just elude or drop them all together. Demanding, e, that's why deadma na lang.

di ba? Pero kung panay ang deadma mo, ikaw rin, baka ma dead ka inside you.

* * *

The next time you encounter a possible "Good Samaritan situation," like when a beggar comes knocking at your gate or car window, don't just dismiss it with your fixed rationalizations and reasons. That's easy. Likewise, it is easy to just give right away and feel good about it in a condescending kind of way. Whatever you do, however you respond to a Good Samaritan situation, don't forget compassion, understanding and mercy. There is no ready-made response because every situation is different. Every person who comes along is different. But, it's the same God who is asking you to be compassionate, understanding and merciful in every situation and in very concrete situations.

* * *

Who is your neighbor? Do you know at all who your neighbor is? Some people have lived in the same neighborhood for the longest time and do not even know, much less, relate with their neighbors. Do something different today. Surprise your neighbor with a visit, a gift or a phone call. Charity begins at home, but let it overflow into your neighborhood. Love your neighbor, di ba?

* * *

We live in a very fast and a very mobile world and you can be a neighbor to so many people anytime, anywhere. How can we be Good Samaritans to all of them? Wow, that's a tall order! Instead of being overwhelmed by the magnitude of our mission, let us be inspired by this text message that says: "The Israelites saw Goliath and thought he's so big he can't miss."

Yes, just do concrete love wherever you are, one day at a time.

A moment with the Lord:
Lord, let my love be concrete, not just paper love or plastic love, one day at a time. Amen.

The explosive C-130 contract

THE C-130 contract is a time bomb waiting to explode, possibly in the halls of Congress where investigation of this contract could rock the Macapagal administration. This contract violates the Constitution, the Revised Administrative Code, the Anti-Graft Law and plain common sense.

A few days ago, a brave soul in the military sent me a copy of this contract. Signed on Feb. 28, 2001 by Defense Secretary Angelo Reyes and Air Force Chief Benjamin Defensor, the contract calls for the purchase of four C-130 military aircraft and two surveillance sensors from Lockheed Martin for a total price $41.32 million.

The Constitution prohibits the expenditure of public funds unless there is an appropriation by Congress. This means that every contract signed by a public official must be covered by a specific congressional appropriation. As Budget Secretary Emilia Bomedin explained, the C-130 contract is not covered by any congressional appropriation. On this score alone, the C-130 contract is absolutely void.

The C-130 contract, however, states that the US$41.32-million purchase price shall be funded by a "pre-approved financing package from the US ExIm Bank and a commercial bank." The schemers behind this contract, aware of the absence of a congressional appropriation, thought they could get around the constitutional ban by funding the contract with a loan. They are wrong.

The Constitution states that "The President may contract or guarantee foreign loans on behalf of the Republic of the Philippines with the prior concurrence of the Monetary Board, and subject to such limitations as may be provided by law." The President has not applied for any loan with the US ExIm Bank for the C-130 contract, and neither has the Monetary Board given its prior approval to such a loan.

Under RA 6142, the law authorizing the President to contract foreign loans, the President can secure foreign loans only for "industrial, agricultural or other economic development projects." The existing law does not allow the President to borrow for military purchases. Congressional authorization is necessary before the President can borrow to purchase military equipment because the proceeds of the loan are public funds, and the expenditure of public funds requires congressional appropriation.

The C-130 contract states that the US ExIm Bank will provide the "pre-approved financing." The charter of the US ExIm Bank, however, expressly prohibits it from extending credit in military sales. The website of the US ExIm Bank categorically states: "ExIm Bank is prohibited, by law, from supporting the sale of military aircraft or civilian aircraft that will be used for military applications." The schemers behind the C-130 contract apparently did a very sloppy job.

CROSSCURRENTS

The Revised Administrative Code mandates that before a public official can sign a contract, he must first secure a "certificate of availability of funds" from his agency's chief accountant. This certificate can be issued only if there is a corresponding congressional appropriation in the agency's regular budget, or in the case of contracts funded by foreign loans, if there is a special budget approved by the President. Any public official violating these requirements "shall be dismissed from the service."

There is no "certificate of availability of funds" issued by any accounting official to authorize the signing of the C-130 contract. Defensor justifies the absence of this certificate by pointing out Article 28 of the contract which states that the contract shall "become effective" upon issuance by the DBM of the Forward Obligation Authority, the equivalent of a certificate of cash availability.

The Code, however, prohibits the mere signing of a contract without the corresponding certificate of cash availability. This is clear from the language of the Code when it mandates that "no contract involving the expenditure of public funds shall be entered into unless there is an appropriation therefore." This is also clear from the Code's requirement that the certificate of cash availability "shall be attached to and become an integral part of the proposed contract."

Defenders of the C-130 contract claim there is as yet no valid contract because the 22-page contract was signed subject to suspensive conditions, like the issuance of a Forward Obligation Authority. Under the Civil Code, a contract is permitted the moment there is a meeting of the minds on the subject matter and the consideration of the contract. The enforcement of a contract can be subject to suspensive conditions, as when the effective date of a signed contract is made to depend on the happening of specified future events. Suspensive conditions do not prevent the legal existence of a contract, but merely suspend or postpone the obligations of the parties under the contract until the happening of the conditions.

The C-130 contract provides that the seller, Lockheed Martin, does not make any warranty, express or implied, that the C-130 aircraft are airworthy. The aircraft are being sold on an "as-is, where-is" basis, without "any implied warranties of merchantability, of fitness, or of non-infringement." Lockheed Martin does not even warrant that the aircraft can fly!

The contract price of $3 million for one C-130 does not include the cost of any repair. There is no indication whatsoever in the contract how much it will cost to repair the aircraft and make them airworthy. The cost of repairs will be negotiated with Lockheed Martin only after the sale.

Most likely Lockheed Martin will demand a cost plus repair contract, with no upper limit on the total repair cost. This will put the Philippines in the same sorry situation as Botswana, which purchased used C-130 aircraft from Marin Lockheed on the same as-is, where-is basis. To date, Botswana has spent $20 million per aircraft on repairs and the planes are still not airworthy.

The C-130 contract obviously qualifies as a "manifestly and grossly disadvantageous contract to the government" as this term is used in the Anti-Graft Law. The contract was negotiated with Lockheed Martin, and there are no valid reasons why the contract was not opened to bidding.

In 1995, President Fidel Ramos canceled the Marconi radar contract precisely because it was not supported by a congressional appropriation. In 1998, President Joseph Estrada tried to revive the Marconi contract, only to retreat when he realized he could be impeached for violating the Constitution. President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo needs the C-130 contract like she needs a hole in the head.

The better part of valor is for Reyes and Defensor to withdraw the C-130 contract and throw it into the wastebasket. Reyes can then face the Commission on Appointments without this millstone around his neck.

Rina Jimenez-David

HERE'S a more cheerful thought. Another reader, a physician, reacted to the "murderous mothers" column by proclaiming the virtues of her hobby:

"My husband is the sweetest, most sensitive man I have ever met. He has done things for me that no one has ever done, and probably never will do. During my pregnancy, when I had ballooned to roughly the size of a refrigerator, he did the laundry, washed the dishes and gave me heavenly foot massages and back rubs. After I had given birth, he would take over caring for the baby at night, wash the baby's bottles and give me (more) heavenly foot massages and back rubs. All these he did without being asked, even when he had just come from a grueling 24-hour duty (he's also a doctor). He has the uncanny ability of reading my mind and knows just when to take over when he senses that I need his help."

"Of all the things I have accomplished in my life so far, being his wife tops the list. The past four years with him have been the best four years of my life. I am proud to be his wife and the mother of his child. Because of his love, I am free to be who and what I am today."

Enough already! I have diabetes, you know. But our ecstatic wife, says she only wanted readers, especially women, to know that "this type of man exists. Yes, Virginia, there is a Mr. Right. I have living proof. But I'll have to say sorry, girls, this one's mine."

You can have him, dear reader. I found mine almost 23 years ago, though I must say the model I have is deficient in the foot massage department.

THERE'S an ongoing Children's Book Festival (until July 22) at the Shangri-la Plaza Mall. There will be a children's book fair, exhibits mounted by various embassies, as well as daily storytelling by well-known performers. InK or Ang Ilustrador ng Kabataan, an organization of children's book illustrators, is also celebrating its 10th anniversary with an exhibit. Admission to all events is free.

task of educating a new generation to the vagaries of private institutions. Marcos came on the scene in the mid-1960s and his theory was that we had lagged behind because we lacked political will. He saw Park Chung Hee's South Korea as a model for rapid growth and, on the basis of this belief, he inaugurated an era of developmental authoritarianism.

Problems of governance shadowed Marcos' efforts at economic development. The world economy entered a period of recession, and he could not repay the foreign loans he had borrowed and misused. His modernization project collapsed because it had become politically untenable. Still, we must credit him for what he tried to do for Philippine agriculture and for the physical infrastructure that he built.

Our experience with Marcos, however, made us skeptical about modernization, and paranoid about our democratic rights and freedoms. In the post-Marcos years, we became blind to the requirements of rapid and sustained economic growth. The series of coup attempts against Cory Aquino frightened investors and distracted us from our economic concerns. Our economy froze on its tracks while the population galloped. Income gaps widened, and the government became incapable of providing the poor the basic services they needed so they might live productive lives.

Today the delicate social balance that the elite defended fiercely from the time of independence is falling apart. The poor refuse to continue shouldering the burdens of a stunted economy. This refusal is increasingly being expressed in political terms. Some smart politicians are tapping into the poor's disenchantment to boost their political ambitions. But properly harnessed, the politicization of the poor can produce lasting social change and economic growth.

The key is to redress historic inequalities by redirecting resources toward meeting basic needs, and to rebuild social trust by reestablishing our society's structure of opportunities.

A giant green tree falls

A PIONEER of the global Green movement passed away last June 18 at the ripe old age of 97. He was René Dumont.

Dumont's life spanned most of the 20th century, and in a very real way he initiated the debate on some of our era's greatest preoccupations: sustainable development, rational allocation of resources and defense of the environment. It was precisely on an environmentalist platform that Dumont ran for the presidency of the French Republic in 1974, and lost—or rather won just 1.32 percent of the vote.

A glib thing to say at this point would be that he was the best president France never had. An agronomist and United Nations consultant, Dumont knew very well that he had no chance at all of winning in 1974 or thereafter. The kind of politics he had in mind had nothing to do with kissing babies, pressing flesh, consensus-building, or national defense, or foreign relations. His was closer to the "small is beautiful" school of thought, and the point of his running for president was to sensitize France and the larger world beyond to humanity's shared environmental problems. In that regard, he was a big success after all.

Dumont was an adviser on general development problems to such post-colonial national leaders as Jawaharlal Nehru, Norodom Sihanouk, Fidel Castro, Ben Bella, Julius Nyerere and Leopold Sedar Senghor. The "socialist" content of some of these leaders' platforms left him skeptical, in spite of his solidarity with their leftwing principles. The behavior of political elites, whether of the North or the South, struck him as posturing and wasteful. Toward the end of his days in power, Senegalese President Senghor would later admit that "he should have listened to Dumont." The warning about environmental degradation and widespread famine that Dumont sounded in his famous work "L'Afrique est Malade" (False Start in Africa) had apparently fallen on deaf ears.

Africa had a very special place in Dumont's heart. It was in Vietnam as a young man that he came up close to the realities of what would later be called the Third World, and from where he derived many of his sensible ideas. Rice-growing, in particular, was a source of fascination for him. Later he would visit China, India, Bangladesh and Taiwan.

In the mid-1980s he had started to look into Philippine conditions, but he did not stay long enough for the thorough field work that he felt necessary for writing a book. He found time to dialogue with a group of UP Diliman students, however.

Neither pro-Soviet nor pro-Chinese in his ideology, Dumont had an open mind where militant politics was concerned. I saw him once at a discussion organized by the Maoist Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) activists and French sympathizers in Paris, where everybody was frisked at the entrance. He was amused, not shocked.

His admiration for Chinese agricultural techniques and work methods did not mean he was a Maoist; he drew the line at cooptation. His sympathy for the Cuban Revolution did not earn him Castro's friendship; "El Maximino Lider" would later call him a CIA agent. If he did not believe in communism, it was because he thought that "planned abundance will never materialize."

There was an anti-racist march where I observed him first before going to greet him. He made a point of staying away from the front lines, where political and civil-society superstars were pushing each other aside to get closer to the cameras. Dumont was no media monster, but the media could not help but pay attention to him when he spoke or wielded his pen.

A yearly issue for French environmentalists is the Paris-Dakar motor rally, which is a huge "sports" event but is justly criticized for being wasteful of fuel and injurious to the habitat—not to mention values and sensibilities—of impoverished Saharan and sub-Saharan communities. Dumont invited me and my wife to join him at the Greens' counter rally at the Bois de Boulogne at some unwholly hour like 4 a.m. in early January 1986, if I remember correctly. The Pa-Dak' (a contraction of the words meant to sound in translation as the equivalent of "Don't agree") counter rally successfully went on without us, needless to say. But old man Dumont was never one to miss such an event.

It was perhaps this energy which he poured into a just cause that kept him young and vigorous for nearly a hundred years. Idealism, but also a sense of humor, preserved him from mummifying. He once told me, deadpan, to keep on using the informal tu form of address with him because who knew, the next time we met he might already be a member of the august Chamber of Deputies (the equivalent of a congressman). He didn't make it to that position either, but he didn't feel it as a big loss. Perhaps it's all for the best, for incidentally, the Greens have not yet overcome their factionalist tendencies.

When I look at the news on television and imagine Rene Dumont as the chief of state saluting the French troops, or hugging the German prime minister, or speaking at the White House lawn, I can't help laughing. I never saw him wearing a necktie, but that's not the only reason for my laughter.

Beijing's coming-out party

BEIJING—The jubilant crowds thronging Tiananmen Square Friday were celebrating something greater than Beijing hosting the 2008 Olympics: they were toasting China's acceptance on the international stage.

For both China's communist leadership and millions of ordinary Chinese, Beijing's Olympic bid was always about more than just sport. Winning the right to become the first Chinese city to host the Games has a huge political and psychological significance for a country and a people still regarded with suspicion by many in the developed world.

China came back into the international sporting arena after decades out in the cold at the Los Angeles games in 1984, fielding its first Olympic team since 1948.

Joseph Cheng, political analyst at Hong Kong's City University said the Olympic success marks a coming of age for China. "The Olympics symbolize the recognition of China's transition from a developing country to a more developed one, showing China is a country with the facilities to hold the Olympics," he said.

The 1998 Olympics in Korea and the 1964 games in Tokyo marked breaks with the turbulent past for those countries. For South Korea it was the chance to show the world a prosperous nation built from the ashes of the Korean War, while for Japan the Games provided an opportunity to leave its notorious wartime history behind.

Beijing sees the 2008 Games as a similar endorsement of China's emergence as a global power, a celebration of its economic achievements and a justification of the communist government's 60-year rule as the party faces a complex leadership transition in 2003.

Sports have acted as a lens through which China views the world at large. Just as ping-pong diplomacy marked the thaw in US-China relations which led to Nixon's visit to China in 1972, many hope the run-up to the 2008 games will usher in a new era in China's relations with the outside world.

China's relations with the United States and other countries are shaped by the ebb and flow of the voices for faster economic reform and closer links with the outside world and those who want a China bound more tightly to its Leninist past. The success of the Olympic bid may add more weight to arguments for faster reform and greater openness, easing tensions with the US which have been exacerbated by the detention of US citizens and residents in recent months.

Furthermore, because China in its bid document has offered the chance for Taipei jointly to host events, the Olympics may also prove a salve for tense cross-Strait relations, despite Beijing's threat to invade Taiwan if it declares independence.

"People in Taiwan feel when there is a major event which involves international audiences Beijing is less likely to resort to tactics like sending missiles over the Taiwan straits," said Joseph Wu, researcher at the National Politics University in Taiwan.

Beijing tested missiles over the Taiwan straits in 1995 but Wu said China may tread a more careful line now to avoid jeopardizing the success of the 2008 games.

While the Games are unlikely to prompt sweeping political change like the transition from dictatorship to democracy sparked by the 1988 games in Korea, hosting the sporting event will ease China's sense of victimhood.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Rachel Morarjee

THE AMERICAN sociologist C. Wright Mills offers a useful distinction between "personal troubles" and "public issues."

"When, in a city of 100,000, only one man is unemployed," Mills says, "that is his personal trouble, and for its relief we properly look to the character of the man, his skills and his immediate opportunities. But when in a nation of 50 million, 15 million are unemployed, that is an issue, and we may no longer hope to find its solution within the range of opportunities open to any one individual. The very structure of opportunities has collapsed."

Poverty in the Philippines is the result of such a collapse in the very structure of opportunities. With nearly half of our entire population living in absolute poverty, we can be sure that this situation is not a product of the personal character of the poor. Any attempt to understand it must focus on the failings of the entire social order, rather than on the personal inadequacies of individual Filipino families. Any attempt to solve it in an enduring way will have to involve an overhaul of our basic political and economic institutions.

We are dealing with two realities here: first, the reality of economic underdevelopment, and second, the reality of inequality. The poverty of our people is the product of both. The amount of wealth that our economy produces is small to begin with. This is the result of the underdevelopment of our productive capacities. The productivity of our labor and the level of sophistication of our technology are very low compared to those of our East Asian neighbors.

On top of this, what wealth we produce is unequally distributed. The rich capture most of it, while the poor get poorer, or are completely excluded from the mainstream production process itself and from the market. Their dwindling share of the nation's product prevents them from transforming themselves into more productive members of society.

The political system gives the poor their political rights and freedoms, but their economic vulnerability prevents them from meaningfully using these rights. What happens then is that they use these rights mainly to secure short-term economic benefits, rather than to shape basic economic policy.

In the 1950s, we were second only to Japan in terms of capacity for economic growth. Today we are nearly at the bottom of the heap in Southeast Asia.

How did we come to this? I think that our special relationship with the United States, in exchange for hosting the American bases, kept us from exploring the full range of options available to nations that were just emerging from their colonial past. The preferential arrangement in the US market for Philippine sugar, for example, shielded the favored Filipino planters from the urgency of competition and modernization. Pegging the peso's value to the American dollar likewise gave us the illusion of prosperity. It made it easier to import than to produce the things we needed.

In short, the urge to rebuild economies and raise productivity in order to compete in the world market, which was very strong in East Asia, was hardly felt by our policy makers. Their reliance on American patronage worked like a curse upon our economic and political life. By the time we realized that being a client state of America had made us into a weak nation, it was quite late. A new world economy had opened up, and we were incapable of seizing the opportunities it was offering.

We had not paid attention to upgrading agriculture, nor to building the basic infrastructure of a modern industrial economy. We allowed our public educational system to deteriorate, leaving the

What kind of Senate president does the country need today?

LIKE the presidency itself, the institution of the third highest post in the land has Quezonian roots. The distinctive post of Senate president (in the US model, it is the Vice President who discharges the largely ceremonial function) may almost be said to have been created expressly for Manuel L. Quezon. The new, more powerful office helped Quezon undermine Speaker Sergio Osmeña's influence, and made Quezon the most powerful Filipino politician of the American period.

Like the Chief Justiceship, the post is primarily primus inter pares—the first among equals, but in a chamber full of officials with presidential ambitions, it is a distinction that goes a long way. Working closely with the majority leader, the Senate president also controls the agenda as well as the permanent staff of the upper chamber.

The ongoing negotiations or consultations to choose the next Senate president take place during a time of political upheaval: the four nights of EDSA II, the six days of "EDSA III," the arrest and arraignment of a deposed President. At such a time, how should the job description for the office read?

Not the person, but the institution

SENATOR AQUILINO PIMENTEL, JR.

Senate president (November 2000 to the present)

THE COUNTRY today needs a Senate that is responsible, independent and pro-people.

Responsible in that, as a Senate, it can deliver on vital legislation—whether sponsored by the administration or the opposition—that will move the country forward.

Independent in that, as a Senate, it is not beholden to any power bloc—political, economic or social—and will, therefore, be prepared to criticize or support government policies, programs and projects where due.

Pro-people in that, as a Senate, it is always responsive to the real needs of the people, open to their plaints, and protective of their interests.

In that way, the Senate will truly be an institution that will help unify, not divide, the nation; move the country forward, not backwards, in terms of economic, social and political development; and secure the equitable, not the inequitable, enjoyment of the blessings of our democracy.

The embodiment of ideals

SENATOR EDGARDO J. ANGARA

Senate president (January 1993 to August 1995)

THE CHOICE of the Senate presidency goes to the very core of what the Senate is; it is the embodiment of the highest ideals of Filipinos. It will determine the direction this illustrious body will take and its effectiveness and relevance in legislating toward modernization and growth. Given the existing political and economic crisis—not to mention the ticking social time bomb that is the ever-widening gap between the rich and the poor—it becomes more crucial for the Senate president to possess certain qualities directly attuned to the needs of our people.

Man of vision

Primarily, the Senate president must be a man of strategic vision.

He knows and understands the Philippine scenario. He is able to assess the Philippine situation from a unique vantage point, where he can fully appreciate its problems. Given our limited resources and time, the pressing problems should be identified and addressed first. This means that he knows the overall problems of the country, and has a keen eye for distinguishing between large problems and trivial ones. After all, true enlightenment comes from knowing what the situation truly is.

He has a full grasp of the impact these problems have on our countrymen, as he must also frame and propose concrete and practical solutions. The Senate president knows the DNA of a successful and growing Philippine economy—and uses this as the blueprint for his legislative agenda.

The Senate president is able to translate his visions into reality, getting solutions implemented soonest. He is a man of action.

This is not an easy task. The Senate president has to handle 23 other senators with 23 differing views and opinions and various party affiliations. He must bridge differences and disagreements, and bring together people from various political persuasions and ideologies.

The Senate president therefore knows how to get the solutions implemented by working with people. He has sufficient persuasive skills to rally his colleagues to a common legislative agenda beneficial to the country. He has the respect and trust of his peers, so that they will work toward a common goal, not mindful of party affiliation or loyalties—only cognizant of their duty to the people.

The Senate president must be patient, determined, and single-minded. I stress the need for determination in light of the pressures from government and various sectors. The Senate president must take note of these pressures, but remain faithful to an agenda which is good for the country.

Sense of urgency

The state of poverty, malnutrition, and peace and order in the Philippines is worsening. Population growth remains at 2.3 percent, resulting in hundreds of thousands of children being born under impoverished circumstances. The peso is on a downward spiral and our country's resources are dwindling. In the face of impending globalization, we must act fast before our domestic industry and agriculture are drowned by foreign trade.

Time is of the essence and the Senate president must act with a sense of urgency. What needs to be done must be done now. Otherwise, the opportunity for progress and reform will pass.

The solutions to our country's problems will not be accomplished in a day, a month, or even during a senator's term. But the Senate president must begin pushing for a responsive legislative agenda now.

But ultimately, the Senate president must be a man with the right perspective. He is keenly aware that he represents an institution proud of its history, tradition and principles. He represents an institution, which is independent, separate from and co-equal to the Executive and Judicial branches of government. He represents an institution effective only when it remains independent and where its members enjoy an unfeigned and free exchange of ideas. He never forgets that the very integrity of the Senate will be on the line if its independence is compromised.

This is particularly important when the Executive branch overreaches into the legislature. The Senate president must remember the proud history of the Senate, where senators have stood and fought for their beliefs; where the halls of the Senate have borne witness to the fiery discourse and cries for reform of its members; and where truth was always the ideal.

Ultimately, the Senate president is someone who is a constructive ally in nation-building and poverty alleviation. His is a role that can spell the difference between our country's growth and continued stagnation; life and even impending death. In his hands lies the key to cracking the code of our decades-long malaise that has condemned the Filipino to a life of poverty.

What the country needs most as her next Senate president is a dedicated public servant whom Filipinos have come to depend on for lasting solutions to age-old problems—the same statesman they have learned to trust, through high summits and churning waters.

The apostle of plurality

SENATOR FRANKLIN M. DRILON

Senate president (April to November 2000)

THE QUESTION must be viewed in the light of the challenges of the present national situation. It must also take into consideration the traditions of the Senate that must be preserved, and the necessary policy reforms that it must initiate.

These are difficult times for country and people. The Macapagal administration, in its infancy, is facing a host of problems, mainly on the domestic scene. The peace and order problem instills fear in the community and scares away local and foreign investors. Poverty blights the countryside and the urban areas. Graft and corruption remain unabated.

Unemployment is high, exports are low and the peso is always losing against the dollar. The jobless cry out for work; the workers cry out for higher pay. These are not new problems. They have always been there.

The Senate president must have a full grasp not only of the socio-economic problems but also of the crucial role of the Senate in coming up with solutions to the ills of the nation. He must recognize that this is a moment when reform has never been more urgent—and the opportunities for it never as great.

A noble tradition

The Senate has a noble tradition to preserve. Philippine history speaks of the wisdom and patriotism of those who have graced the hallowed halls of the Senate and how they worked to bring forth an institution worthy of the trust of the people.

The Senate president must therefore lead to preserve the traditions of the Senate, both as a conserving institution and, equally important if not more so, as the fount of reforms. The Senate has been seen and accepted as a center for stability, as well as a force for change.

As a lawmaking body, the Senate is committed to the basic right not only to disagree but also to protect.

As leader of the chamber, the Senate president must be prepared to claim this right, and claim it often. In the defense of the chamber's independence, he must be prepared to do all that is necessary, but at the same time he must be willing to do as much in the defense of what is right.

It might be that in the course of doing both, he would have to disagree with the President of the Republic as well as with others, whether in government or outside it.

The Senate president must not only encourage but work for plurality and divergence of ideas. He must have the ability to inspire both agreement and disagreement, fully cognizant that disagreement is a vital feature in a democracy; he must uphold and defend this right of every senator.

Vision and political will

The Senate president must be in the forefront of pushing for legislation urgently desired and needed by the country, especially those bearing on economic development and poverty alleviation. He must have the vision not just to formulate new thrusts and directions in policy legislation, but the political will and moral rectitude to get the members of the Senate to work together toward a common goal.

He must push relentlessly for programs of government that serve the national interest and oppose vigorously those that work to its detriment. He must uphold the Senate tradition of fiscalizing when the situation calls for it, and of cooperation when what is good for the country is on the line.

The Senate president should not lose sight of the situation on the home front. He is the chief executive of the Senate and with that office goes the responsibility of instilling efficiency and fostering productivity in the Senate administrative machinery, extending service to its constituents, and promoting high employee morale.

As one senator eloquently put it, the ideal Senate president must not only preside. More importantly, he must participate actively in the work on the floor. He must exercise hands-on leadership to ensure that the Senate legislative mill constantly runs at full speed.

On a personal plane, the Senate president must not only be perceived as but must actually be a firm and resolute leader, of unblemished integrity and high moral standards, God-fearing, compassionate to others, committed to family values and the traditional values of honesty and hard work. The last trait needs to be emphasized, because the burdens of the Senate Presidency are such that they require long hours of study and work.

Talking points

at this time, what defines the integrity of the Senate for the public.

Which brings us to the special character of these articles. They are campaign statements of a kind, but they are more in the nature of coded communiqués, bulletins from the inside.

The really important statements are nuances in interpretation, subtle shifts in positions.

When Angara, for instance, says the senators must "work toward a common goal, not mindful of party affiliation or loyalties—only cognizant of their duty to the people," he is signaling a greater willingness to broaden his base of support to include administration senators?

When Drilon writes that the "Senate president must not only encourage but work for plurality and divergence of ideas," what exactly is he telegraphing the opposition?

These nuances may be overheard by the public, but they gain resonance only in the suites of the Senate, in the context of the consultations and negotiations that are going on.

Finally, a word about

LIFTING one's own banch, even if only by implication, is an occupational hazard for all politicians. Sen. Pimentel avoids the problem altogether by reformulating the question. What kind of Senate does the country need today, he asks, and then proceeds to describe the virtues of an institution, not a person. It is hard to quarrel with that rhetorical strategy, although we trust there is no one in the Senate dense enough not to read between the lines.

Sens. Drilon and Angara, famously one-time partners a long time ago in a big-name law firm, follow essentially the same, straightforward, deductive approach. They begin with an appreciation of existing conditions, treat of the role the Senate ought to play, and then proceed to an anatomy of the kind of leader the upper chamber needs today.

Angara, the lone opposition candidate for the Senate presidency, is more unsparing in his descriptions of existing conditions: "crippling economic crisis, serious breaches in national security, utter lawlessness, and deteriorating peace and order." Drilon, the leading reelectionist for Pimentel's style. He uses an antithetical structure—finely balanced phrases and clauses succeeding one another—made familiar to most of us through the incendiary Gettysburg Address. May the Senate, he writes, be "an institution that will help unify, not divide, the nation; move the country forward, not backwards" and so on. If done badly, the structure reveals the paucity or the triteness of the ideas behind the structure. If done well, it can convince even the cynical with a Lincoln-esque flourish.—J. Nery

Kashmir key to success of summit—Musharraf

NEW DELHI—Pakistan's President Gen. Pervez Musharraf arrived for a peace summit in India yesterday with the message that only progress on Kashmir could lead to the "full normalization" of relations.

Musharraf flew in to monsoon-swept New Delhi with a lean 15-member delegation ahead of Sunday's summit with Indian Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpeyi, aimed at easing more than 50 years of mutual hostility and mistrust.

The run-up to the summit has been marked by a hardening of stances on both sides over the crucial issue of Kashmir—cause of two full-scale wars since the partition of the sub-continent in 1947.

In an arrival statement issued by the Pakistan High Commission, Musharraf said he had "come with an open mind" but made it clear that any movement on other bilateral issues was conditional on progress over Kashmir.

"I will be looking forward to a meaningful, frank and substantial discussion, urging them to join hands with us in resolving this dispute in accordance with the wishes of the Kashmiri people," he said.

"This will facilitate resolution of other issues and lead to a full normalization of ties."

India is adamant its sovereign claim to Kashmir—divided between the two countries and claimed by both—is non-negotiable and that the summit must address other issues like trade, cross-border terrorism and confidence-building measures between the nuclear capable rivals.

Even as Musharraf arrived, exchanges of machinegun fire were reported across the Line of Control dividing Indian- and Pakistan-administered Kashmir.

At the official welcoming ceremony hosted by President K.R. Narayanan, Musharraf, who seized power in an October, 1999 coup, was given a 21-gun salute.

UN office slammed for racial bias

UNITED NATIONS—Three Africans said they are victims of racial bias at the United Nations and called for an internal meeting on a problem they claimed is widespread within the organization.

Two of the staffers told journalists Friday they resigned because of discrimination in the UN's mission in Kosovo, the Yugoslav province run by the United Nations since 1999.

The United Nations is investigating the claims but denies a pattern of racial discrimination.

Nana Ackom-Mensah, of Ghana, and Abdi Yahya, a Somali native and US citizen, said they and at least one other person, a Filipino, were transferred from their posts within the last year.

Ideals

"There, in Kosovo, is a very clear-cut policy of discrimination," said Yahya. He added, "Ethnic intolerance within the United Nations mission in Kosovo eats away the ideals and values" the UN was founded upon five decades ago.

Yahya claimed discrimination in personnel matters is widespread even in missions such as Kosovo, set up "to create a climate of ethnic tolerance" among Serbs and ethnic Albanians.

In March, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said the organization had a "very open and transparent system for recruitment and promotion" and that a 1999 investigation did not uncover serious race discrimination in personnel matters.

Ackom-Mensah said that "to be bullied and intimidated by senior management anywhere in the world is not only stressful, but also mentally, morally and psychologically disturbing." In a hazardous place like Kosovo, it is particularly unwelcome, she said.

Probe

UN spokesperson Fred Eckhard said that a panel is investigating the allegations of discrimination at the UN mission in Kosovo and will issue findings by July 25.

Eckhard said it was "too bad they did not wait for the outcome" of the investigation before making the accusations public. Yahya said both his and Ackom-Mensah's resignation are effective at the end of July.

Another African, Joao Gomes of Guinea-Bissau, said he was repeatedly passed over for promotion since he joined the United Nations in 1989 and is fighting a 1998 decision not to renew his contract. Eckhard declined to comment on Gomes' case.

Gomes said it would be hypocritical to hold the World Conference Against Racism—set for Aug. 31-Sept. 7 in Durban, South Africa—with-out addressing the issue of bias at home. AP FLIGHT attendant Anne Marie Smith, who says she had an affair with United States Congressman Gary Condit, is interviewed by talk show host Larry King on the CNN program "Larry King Live," July 13 at the CNN studios in Los Angeles. Smith said Condit asked her to lie about their affair after intern Chandra Levy disappeared.

Lawyer says Condit passed Levy lie test

WASHINGTON—Rep. Gary Condit took a lie-detector test arranged by his lawyer and it showed he "was not deceptive in any way" in denying knowledge of what happened to missing intern Chandra Levy, the lawyer said. Police dismissed the test as "self-serving."

With Condit's relationship with Levy, who disappeared 11 weeks ago, and other women under intense media scrutiny, lawyer Abby Lowell said that his client had cooperated fully.

"Congressman Condit has exhausted all the information he can provide, and the spotlight on him should be turned elsewhere," said Lowell, who noted the congressman has given three interviews to police, allowed a search of his apartment and submitted a DNA sample.

According to a police source, Condit, who is 53 and married, told investigators in his third interview last week that he was having an affair with Levy, a 24-year-old intern at the federal Bureau of Prisons from the congressman's Modesto, California-area home district. She was last seen April 30.

Police, however, have repeatedly said Condit is not a suspect in Levy's disappearance, and that he is one of dozens of people who have been interviewed, some more than once.

Investigators are awaiting lab results on Condit's DNA sample and items they took from Condit's apartment during a search this week, said Assistant Police Chief Terrence Gainer.

Lowell declined to provide any more details about Condit's relationship with Levy. He would not identify all the questions that were asked during the test, but said Condit was deemed to have answered truthfully when he said "no" to the three most important questions:

- Did the congressman have anything at all to do with Miss Levy's disappearance?

Did he harm her or cause anyone else to harm her in any way?

- Does he know where she can be located?

Lowell said the test was administered by Barry D. Colvert, a polygraph expert who Lowell said teaches FBI officials how to administer the tests and has been used by the government in a number of high-profile espionage cases.

Gainer acknowledged Colvert has a good reputation and said there could be some value in the test.

Wahid aide opposes emergency rule

JAKARTA—Indonesian President Abdurrahman Wahid's top security minister has vowed to try to stop the embattled leader from declaring a state of emergency to stay in power, local media reports said yesterday.

"As the coordinating minister for political, social and security affairs, I will try to stop the president from issuing the decree," the Jakarta Post quoted Agum Gumilar as saying.

Wahid warned on Friday that he would declare a state of emergency at 6 p.m. on July 20 if the national assembly (MPR) did not drop plans to convene an impeachment hearing against him on Aug. 1.

The move would enable Wahid—whom his parliamentary foes accuse of incompetence and involvement in two financial scandals—to dissolve parliament.

Gumilar, a retired general, assumed his Cabinet post last month after several high-ranking military officials and his predecessor, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, declared their opposition to a state of emergency.

MPR chair Amien Rais, a long-time foe of Wahid, on Friday responded to Wahid's threat by saying that should the president declare an emergency, the MPR would call the impeachment session the same day, and convene on July 21.

With the scheduled impeachment hearing only two weeks away, Wahid until Friday was still expressing confidence that he could reach a compromise with his political foes to avert impeachment.

"We still have (time). Hopefully within this week Mr. Hamzah, Mr. Akbar, with the assistance of Mr. Marzuki, will find a satisfactory resolution," Wahid said in West Java, according to the state Antara news agency.

Marzuki, Wahid's Cabinet secretary and a member of the Golkar party of former president Suharto is helping Wahid in his attempts to talk to his foes, including Golkar chair Akbar Tanjung and Hamzah Haz, leader of the Muslim United Development Party (PPP).

Wahid would need the support of the police to declare a civil emergency, but most analysts here predict that the police, which has only recently been separated from the armed forces, would not move without the military's approval.

On Saturday local media reports said the police appeared to be consolidating their ranks after a tumultuous month during which sacked police chief Gen. Suroyo Bimantoro continued to refuse to step down after being fired by Wahid.

Bimantoro, who had also said he was opposed to a state of emergency, was declared inactive by Wahid, who then appointed a new deputy national police chief to take over his duties.

More than 100 senior police officers rallied to Bimantoro's side, but the president then promoted hundreds of middle-ranked police officers who had accepted the firing and urged Bimantoro to step down.

On Thursday the police crisis peaked when a presidential spokesperson said Wahid had ordered Gumilar to take legal action against Bimantoro, including his possible arrest. AFP

Macedonia close to peace deal, says minister

SKOPJE—Signs are growing that Macedonian leaders are close to a deal that will clear the way for Nato troops to move in and disarm ethnic Albanian guerrillas who have brought the Balkan state to the brink of civil war.

Defense Minister Vlado Buckovski said after meeting Nato officials Friday that a political package bolstering the Albanian minority's rights could be agreed by the multi-ethnic coalition "before Sunday," opening the door to a Nato deployment of 3,000 troops.

He said the lightly armed Atlantic alliance force could start moving in "within 10 days, starting from Thursday (July 12)."

Buckovski said an amnesty for the guerrillas would be declared "before the deployment, according to the peace plan" drawn up by President Boris Trajkovski.

The Nato troops would deploy at a single location and gather the rebels' weapons, if leaders of the self-proclaimed National Liberation Army (NLA) agree to end their six-month armed campaign for more Albanian rights.

Trajkovski met again with US and EU envoys James Pardew and Francois Leotard Friday to keep the peace talks going after Leotard said a breakthrough was close at hand.

At the same time, legal experts continued their haggling over a draft formula for political reforms.

The document, which has already undergone one rewrite since being presented last weekend by Pardew and Leotard, was put before the leaders of the two Macedonian Slav and two ethnic Albanian coalition parties Thursday.

"US envoy Pardew admitted Friday that the ongoing political negotiations were problematic."

"The negotiations have been very difficult," Pardew said.

Math Olympics: China 1st place, US, Russia next

WASHINGTON—Though China won six gold medals with two perfect scores, the real winner at this year's International Mathematical Olympiad, which ended Friday, was 18-year-old Reid Barton, a four-time champion after this year's perfect score.

More than 450 participants from 83 countries competed in the two-week math challenge, which ended Friday with a ceremony and a dinner at the Kennedy Center here. US President George W. Bush sent a pre-taped congratulations message to the winners.

The United States and Russia tied for second place behind perennial winner China, with US students, led by the home-schooled Barton, taking four golds and two silvers and the Russian team winning five golds and one silver. Kazakhstan followed with four golds and one silver.

Barton, who works part-time at the high-tech firm Akamai, will on Sunday head to Helsinki for the International Olympiad in Informatics, an annual computer competition, said IMO team leader Titu Andreescu. He has won a gold medal in four consecutive Olympics, a world-record.

Students under the age of 20 who have not yet entered university are eligible to compete in the math Olympics, which involves two six-question exams lasting four-and-a-half hours each. The rest of the competition included sports and field trips. AP

SUPREME COURT DOCTRINES

REMEDIAL LAW (CRIMINAL PROCEDURE)—Preliminary Investigation—Rule 112, Section 1 of the Rules of Court defines a preliminary investigation as "an inquiry or proceeding for the purpose of determining whether there is sufficient ground to conduct a well-founded belief that a crime cognizable by the Regional Trial Court has been committed and that the respondent is probably guilty thereof, and should be held liable for trial." For practical considerations and also dictated by necessity considering the lack of prosecutors in the provinces, Judges of the Municipal Trial Courts and Municipal Circuit Trial Courts have been authorized to conduct preliminary investigations. When a municipal judge conducts a preliminary investigation, he performs a non-judicial function. His function is merely executive in nature. As such, the findings of an investigating judge are subject to review by the Provincial Fiscal whose findings in turn may also be reviewed by the Secretary of Justice in appropriate cases. Hence, after conducting the preliminary investigation, it is the ministerial duty of the investigating judge to transmit within 10 days after the conclusion thereof the resolution of the case together with the entire records to the Provincial Prosecutor in accordance with Section 5 of Rule 112, regardless of his belief or opinion of the character of the crime committed. China convicts US academic of spying BEIJING—An American academic, Li Shaomin, was convicted of spying in China yesterday and ordered deported, the state news agency Xinhua reported.

Li's conviction was announced by the agency less than seven hours after his trial had been scheduled to begin.

The agency did not say when Li would be deported.

Li, 45, has been in detention since Feb. 25 when he was picked up in the southern city of Shenzhen, just north of Hong Kong, and detained without explanation.

The Chinese-born US academic, who was formally charged with spying for Taiwan in May, has a doctorate from Princeton University and was teaching at the City University of Hong Kong up until his arrest.

"Large number of evidence produced at the court show that Li accepted tasks from a Taiwan spy organization and collected information for it, which harmed state security of China," Xinhua said.

Analysts had predicted Li's trial would be wrapped up quickly and that he would be deported to ease unresolved sensitive issues from Sino-US relations ahead of a visit by US Secretary of State Colin Powell at the end of this month.

Powell will be the most senior US official to visit China under the Bush administration.

The trial was timed the day after Beijing won the bid to host the 2008 Olympic Games to avoid controversy during the bid, analysts said.

Li's case is believed to be the first trial involving a US citizen held on political charges since the 1995 trial of Harry Wu, a Chinese-American who was charged with spying for videotaping and documenting China's use of prison labor. Other US residents, who were not citizens, have been tried by China in the past.

Wu was put on a flight back to the United States the day after the verdict was announced.

A US Embassy official welcomed China's decision to deport Li but said he did not know when Li would be deported or where he would be deported to. AFP

Charles hit for not going to Di's grave

LONDON—The brother of Diana, Princess of Wales, has criticized Prince Charles for failing to visit the grave of his late wife, British media reported yesterday.

Lord Charles Spencer implied he believed that the prince, the heir to the British throne, wanted to draw a line under his failed marriage to Diana, who died in a car crash in Paris in August 1997.

Spencer lamented the fact that almost four years later Prince Charles had not been to see her resting place on an island at Althorp, her childhood home in central England.

Invitation

"Prince Charles has an open invitation to the memorial but as yet he has not paid a visit. You would have to ask him or his representatives why he hasn't," Spencer said. CMC

With the exception of Diana's sons Prince William and Prince Harry, not one member of the royal family has been to Althorp since the Princess' funeral in September 1997, The Times said.

Spencer added "I have no idea why he (Prince Charles) has not done so but it may be that he sees her as an ex-wife."

Prince William, 19, made an emotional pilgrimage to his mother's island grave on July 1 on what would have been her 40th birthday.

Birthday

On the morning of her birthday he rowed the 40 meters to her burial site, The Times added.

He spent several minutes alone at the graveside, leaving a small bunch of white flowers.

Asked by Simon Mayo, a BBC radio presenter, whether he thought Charles was being callous, Spencer replied: "I don't know. I don't look at it from his point of view."

"It's an ex-wife from his point of view so maybe that's how he views it."

Charles and Diana divorced in August 1996. She died a year later in a car crash.

Museum

Spencer has created a memorial museum to the princess at the family seat. Hundreds of thousands of people have visited the gardens and house, which is open every summer.

St James's Palace, Prince Charles's London residence, told The Times: "How the prince remembers is a private matter for him."

Spencer's comments come a week after Charles declined for the first time to rule out the prospect of marrying his long-time companion Camilla Parker Bowles.

"Who knows what the good Lord has planned? You can't be certain about anything," he said in a magazine interview. AFP

Grand Opening Sale June 15-July 15, 2001

COTABATO CITY—Kidnappers of Chinese engineer Zhang Zhong Qiang, who are demanding $4 million (P212 million) in ransom, yesterday said they would negotiate only through an emissary from the Libyan Embassy.

The leader of the kidnap gang also said they wanted Zhang's firm, China Import-Export Technologies (Citech), out of the Malitubog-Maridaga irrigation dam project in Carmen, North Cotabato, "because they are treasure hunters disguised as contractors."

"We will only listen to any official from (the) Libyan Embassy," Hamsha Abu said in Filipino in a video footage that reached Notre Dame Broadcasting Corp. here.

Abu, who belongs to the Lanao del Sur-based kidnap gang led by Faizal Marohombsar, threatened to behead Zhang, 43, if the demands are not met.

Zhang, who hardly speaks English, was carrying a large amount of cash when he was seized on June 20 by four gunmen. The victim also works as procurement officer of Citech.

Police arrested four suspects who admitted that the victim was handed over to a kidnapper for the negotiation.

Abu and Faizal claimed Zhang was brought to the hinterlands of Lanao del Sur, but North Cotabato Gov. Emmanuel Piñol, who was designated by the Chinese Council General's office as in charge of the rescue efforts, would not buy the kidnappers' claim.

"I don't care who they are. The government will not give in to their demands," Piñol said as he insisted on the government's no-ransom policy.

Abu warned that if Libya would not negotiate for Citech, they will hand over Zhang to the Abu Sayyaf group in Basilan and Sulu.

"If the negotiation will not take place, we will behead this man," Abu said in a videotape sent to media outlets here.

"I don't care if they bring Zhang to Basilan, Sulu or Tawi-tawi," Piñol said. "These people should not be allowed to kidnap anyone in North Cotabato and get ransom . . . we will not allow that."

In the video footage, the victim appeared tired and had lost weight while in captivity.

"We are taking care of him, he even sleeps beside our men," Abu said.

Presidential Assistant Jesus Dureza for Mindanao said Zhang's abductors would not get any ransom. But he offered livelihood to the group if they surrendered and availed themselves of the government's amnesty program.

Wiretap case vs Ping

DAVAO CITY—Chief Supt. Eduardo Matillano, police director in Southern Mindanao and member of a reform movement within the Philippine National Police, said he was seeking the reopening of the anti-wiretapping case filed against Sen. Panfilo Lacson.

Matillano expressed optimism that Lacson would be prosecuted for violation of the Anti-Wiretapping Law. Lacson, then head of the PNP Task Force Alpha, allegedly ordered the bugging of phones of practically every high-ranking police official and the offices of its special task force in 1998.

Ucag said soldiers of the Army's 25th Infantry Battalion and militiamen were in the boundary of Salidocon and Simuron villages when they encountered a group of New People's Army rebels. Recovered from the battle site were a combat pack containing anti-government documents, a handheld radio, a grenade, and a 357 cal revolver.

Tourist arrivals down

CAGAYAN DE ORO CITY—Tourist arrivals in Northern Mindanao dropped by 14 percent during the first quarter compared with the number during the same period last year, according to the regional tourism office here. The decrease was monitored after the Sipadan hostage crisis in April last year and the government's all-out war against the Moro Islamic Liberation Front. Tourist arrivals have dwindled again lately after the Dos Palmas kidnapping incident in May. According to the tourism department, only 4,864 foreigners arrived in the region from January to March, a 33-percent decline from 7,215 during the first quarter of 2000. Grace Cantal-Albasin and Joselle Badilla, PDI Mindanao Bureau

Anti-drugs campaign launched in Lanao Sur

COTABATO CITY Sectoral groups in Lanao del Sur are up in arms against the rampant use of illegal drugs in the province.

Supt. Geni Aceri, police mobile group chief in the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao, said a province-wide educational campaign on illegal drugs was launched to check the growing number of drug dependents.

Aceri said the police were also after "drug lords" financing the operations of white slavery prostitution, guns-for-hire, kidnapping, robbery and extortion gangs.

Last week, Aceri said his men arrested Vi ma Sariff and her 10-year-old son for allegedly selling shabu (methamphetamine hydrochloride) to school children in Malabang, Lanao del Sur.

Police seized P30,000 worth of shabu from them. Shabu costs P3,800 per sachet.

The entry of shabu in Lanao del Sur has reduced the demand for marijuana in schools, said Ma abang Mayor Anwar Bahindog, who held an anti-drug symposium in his town last Sunday.

"The demand for shabu among drug users in the province and in my municipality has risen (so) tremendously that children of prominent families have already been lured to it," Bahindog said in Maranao.

"We've got to put an end to this before Ma abang and the whole of Lanao rot and sink," he added.

He said he would give a cash reward to anyone who can report to the authorities the financiers or peddlers of illegal drugs.

Oabdya Pinwan, 15, a student leader of the Maleabang National High School, has urged police and military authorities "to jail the pusher and rehabilitate the user."

Pinwan, who appealed for a "drug-free Malabang" said this would only happen if all other towns in Lanao del Sur and other neighboring provinces have the same vision.

Civic leader Adolfo Briones said the success of the anti-drug campaign depended on the "political will of our leaders in enforcing the law without fear or favor."

Malabang officials have agreed to impose a curfew from 10 p.m. to 4 a.m. Charlie C. Señase, PDI Mindanao Bureau

Sale of Bohol utility firm probed

BY MALOU G. APALISOK
PDI Visayas Bureau

CEBU CITY—Bohol Gov. Erico Aumentado has ordered a review of the alleged irregular sale of a power and water utilities company owned by the province to a private consortium last year.

Aumentado issued Executive Order 1 on July 9, ordering the creation of a committee to review the provincial government's joint venture project with the Consortium of Salcon International, Salcon Philippines and Salcon Ltd.

The committee will recommend legal remedies to purge provisions of the agreement that would be found grossly disadvantageous to the provincial government and the consumers.

Provincial legal officer Angel Ucat Jr will head the committee. Members are provincial prosecutor Reinerio Namocat, Paulino Clarin, dean of the Divine Word College-College of Law; Artemio Villas, Integrated Bar of the Philippines-Bohol president; and first assistant city prosecutor Adriano Montes.

Last year, then Bohol Gov. Rene Relampagos sold the Provincial Power Utilities Department (PPUD), a province-owned firm that serves Tagbilaran City and Bohol, to Salcon Consortium for P150 million through a joint venture agreement.

Relampagos ran for a third term in the May 14 elections but lost to Aumentado by about 10,000 votes.

Under the agreement, the PPUD's operation was turned over to two newly formed companies, Bohol Light and Bohol Water, which are managed by Salcon Consortium.

Salcon Consortium has a 70-percent equity in the two companies. The provincial government keeps the remaining 30 percent.

But Bohol lawyers Zottico Ochavillo, Nero Zamora, Aster Apalisok-Piñol, Alexander Lum, Victor de la Serna and Myrna Pagsuberon questioned the project, claiming the province lost P998 million in the transaction.

They claimed Salcon, which offered a bid of P150 million, bagged the contract although the other bidders, like Abontiz, offered higher bids.

The lawyers said the Manila-based Asian Appraisal Co. Inc. assessed the PPUD to be worth P1.48 billion.

But the firm, they added, was reportedly told to make another assessment until it came up with a P150-million evaluation by excluding the franchise value of the power and water firm.

The lawyers, however, pointed out that the PPUD's franchise value should be taken as a major consideration in the valuation because the firm is a monopoly in Tagbilaran.

They also questioned why the provincial government paid P47 million to Salcon Consortium for its 30-percent equity in the two companies. The money, they claimed, was taken from the P.50 million paid by Salcon to the provincial government.

In October last year, the lawyers filed plunder cases against Relampagos and other provincial officials before the Office of the Ombudsman in the Visayas based in Cebu City for allegedly conspiring "to commit the biggest crime against the people of Bohol."

The case is still pending.

They filed a petition for injunction before the Municipal Trial Court in Cities (MTCC) last year to stop the provincial board from passing a resolution that would authorize Relampagos to enter into a contract with Salcon.

But the MTCC dismissed their petition on a technicality, prompting the lawyers to elevate their case to the regional trial court.

Judge Venancio Amia of RTC Branch 3 also junked the petition, saying the issue was "political and does not fall within jurisdiction of the court."

The lawyers elevated the case before the Court of Appeals. They were able to secure a 60-day injunction order but 24 hours after the injunction's expiry, the provincial government turned over supervision and management of the PPUD to Salcon.

The Huluga Caves: Back to prehistory

BY FROILAN GALLARDO
Cagayan de Oro City

DID men and women live and hunt in what is now Cagayan de Oro City at the time the Egyptians built the pyramids?

Historians and anthropologists in Cagayan de Oro City believe they have evidence that man lived here even before the Egyptian boy King Tutankhamen ascended to his throne in 1360 B.C.

But this important archeological evidence would soon be forever lost.

The archeological site that contained the artifact, including those dating back to the Iron Age, would be destroyed to make way for development.

The Huluga Caves and an adjoining open site block the path of a proposed bridge and a four-lane highway in Barangay Taguanao in Cagayan de Oro.

The bridge is expected to open for development the southern half portion of the city and ease worsening traffic.

The anthropologists and historians are furious. "Government planners have the habit of tearing down all historical sites in the city," said historian Antonio Montalvan III.

"It's a pity because Cagayanons will no longer be able to see this important heritage," says Dr. Erlinda Burton, chair of the Rural Institute for Mindanao Cuatres of Xavier University.

Findings

Burton said the Huluga Caves and the open site in an adjoining crop field contained evidence that man was already in Cagayan de Oro during the Neolithic Age or 1600 B.C.

"This means that civilization was in Cagayan de Oro at that time the Egyptians built their pyramids," Burton said.

She said the findings in the Huluga Caves were the oldest archeological find in Mindanao.

"We have proof that civilization existed here before Rome became an empire in 753 B.C. and the Great Wall of China was completed in 204 B.C." Burton said.

"What a waste if the caves and the open site would be destroyed. Cagayanons will never know their history," she added.

Most of the findings were made by the Philippine National Museum and a team of anthropologists from Xavier University led by Burton in the 1970s and 1990s.

In one of the caves, the team found the skeletal remains of a woman and a broken pottery.

A bone fragment was sent to the Scripps Institute in La Jolla, California. Through a process called acid recrystallization, the institute dated the piece to 1,600 BC.

Senior Museum Researcher Angel Bautista of the National Museum, who made 21 archeological diggings in the site, also found pottery fragments dating back to the early Ming Dynasty in the 14th century.

Prehistoric culture

The sites provided evidence of a prehistoric culture that once flourished specifically in the west and east banks of the Cagayan River," Bautista said in a report.

The report also suggested that the recovered artifacts ranged from the Metal Age to the "age of contact" before the Spaniards arrived in the Philippines.

This only meant that civilization had lived in the Huluga Caves and the adjoining areas until the Spaniards came, Burton said.

In his book, "Cagayan," the late Fr. Francisco Demetrio, S.J., said the Augustinian Recollect friars persuaded local chieftain Datu Satangang and the natives to move from the Huluga Caves to the present site of Cagayan de Oro in what is now Gaston Park in 1622.

"We should be proud of the Huluga Caves. That is our birthplace, the seat of ancient Cagayan de Oro," said Luis Ostique, curator of the Xavier University museum.

For lack of money, Ostique said no new archeological diggings were made after 1992.

ARTIFACTS found from the Huluga Caves, including a woman's skull, are displayed at the Xavier University Museum in Cagayan de Oro City.

The caves have been forgotten. The present site has been transformed into pastureland and trees grow from the alluvial deposits that were formed as the Cagayan de Oro River changed course.

Access to the caves remains difficult though. The caves are found 100 feet in a cliff above the river. One has to rappel down to get inside.

Time has also caught up with the caves.

Bridge project

The city government has decided to build a bridge and a four-lane highway across the adjoining Huluga open site.

"This bridge means a lot to us. It will open the city's southern portion for development and ease our traffic problem," says city engineer Jorge Bingona.

He said the city had already been experiencing worsening traffic problems despite the existence of two other bridges.

Bingona said 16,000 to 18,000 vehicles passed every 16 hours over the old bridge beside City Hall.

"The more bridges we have, the better. We need five more new bridges," he said.

Bingona said the city should have built one bridge every 10 years since 1970 to ease the traffic flow, or a total of four bridges. But only one bridge was built in the 1980s when the Iligan-Cagayan de Oro-Butuan highway was constructed, he said.

"The people kept on prodding us to build more bridges. We are now ready, but here comes the problem about the Huluga Caves," Bingona said.

The bridge in Taguanao would be built by White-Horse Trading Development Corp., a Manila-based firm, under a "build-transfer" scheme.

Total cost of the bridge, including the nine-kilometer highway, is more than P600 million.

No ECC

Esteban Agdagdag, senior operations manager of White Horse Trading, said construction started in January but was stopped temporarily. Operations would resume this month.

Presently, a jetty was constructed for the cranes and other heavy equipment to cross the Cagayan de Oro River.

The regional Environment Management Bureau, however, found the construction firm operating without an environmental Clearance Certificate or ECC.

The city government applied for an ECC only on May 29.

Faced with all the problems, Bingona gave assurance that a portion of the road would be diverted so that the construction would not destroy the archeological site.

He said the proposed bridge would be constructed 250 meters from the Huluga Caves.

"I am also a Cagayanon. I assure you enough mitigating measures would be set in place to prevent the site," Bingona told the INQUIRER.

Agdagdag said his firm would work closely with historians and anthropologists during the construction and promised to turn over any artifacts found during the road construction.

Still, local historians, anthropologists and tourism officials would not say yes.

Dorothy Jean Pabayo, regional director of the Department of Tourism, has asked Tourism Secretary Richard Gordon to intervene in order to preserve the archeological site.

Young guns no more

BY EDWIN O. FERNANDEZ
Cotabato City

FOR 13-year-old Guiatal Esmael, a gun is not a toy. If you have it, you are someone else in the community, he says.

Many times in his young life, Esmael saw, held but never attempted to fire guns. "I was frightened because I know it can take precious lives."

In the swampy community where he lives, children imitate what they see in the movies, carrying and keeping replicas of the firearms.

Enchanted by the power of the gun, Esmael says he bought three pellet guns, all replicas of a 45-cal. pistol, "several Decembers ago."

Esmael is among the many children all over the country who had learned to love toy guns, unaware of the values they had imbibed.

But teachers at the J. Marquez Elementary School in Cotabato City are molding their pupils to work for peace and become instruments of peace and understanding.

Esmael, the would-be valedictorian when he graduates this school year, has learned to hate guns, including replicas, and the culture of violence they spawn.

When the campaign of the United National Multi-Donor program against the proliferation of illicit small firearms was announced, Esmael volunteered to hand over his toys. His school was chosen as pilot area of the campaign.

Treasure seeds

The young boy will lead his schoolmates in gathering replicas of the instruments of death in exchange for seedlings of fruit-bearing trees that the peace advocates, academe and the military are offering.

Esmael has this simple advice to those belonging to his generation: "Let's do away with the instruments of war. Let's be peacemakers. Let's sacrifice so that others may be happy, including our parents."

"A very simple appeal from this boy," says Manding Salik, principal of the J. Marquez Elementary School. "But it brings a very strong signal to you and me."

Esmael would not say how many toy guns the pupils would gather. "Basta marami (Many, for sure)."

Ramon Flores, program coordinator of UN program, said the campaign would be launched at the end of the month, in time for the culminating activity of the government's Disaster Consciousness Month.

Campaign theme

With the theme "From Instruments of Death to Nurturing of Life," the campaign encourages elementary school children to have their toy guns turned over to peace advocates in exchange for seedlings which they can plant and nurture.

The participants are the Cotabato City Kids for Peace; Department of Education, Culture and Sports; Notre Dame University Center for Peace, Justice and Integrity of Creation, and the Army's 6th Infantry Division.

"This symbolic gesture from the children will send a strong message of peace to the public and to those who are in the business of small firearms," Flores said in a statement.

About 1,000 school children will receive seedlings in exchange for their toy guns. Teachers will explain the rationale of the program, Flores said.

The organizers will also conduct roundtable discussions on how to expand the project to cover not only Cotabato City but also other urban centers in Mindanao.

"The collected toy guns will be swapped to access support from the UNDP Small Arms Trust Fund to sustain the initiative," Flores said.

The Kids for Peace, an organization of school children in Mindanao, had earlier initiated the collection of toy guns during the Army-Moro rebel war last year.

Army support

According to military estimates, Southern Philippines has at least 100,000 loose firearms, excluding those in the hands of Moro rebels and other bandit groups.

Maj. Juheto Ando, 6th ID spokesperson, said the military was extending full support to the campaign because the "love guns," although replicas among children, must be "confiscated" before they could acquire the real ones.

He suggested though that appeals should be sent to the manufacturers of toy guns, especially those resembling the real ones.

"Toy guns are used in some criminal acts, like robbery and hold-up," he said.

Cotabato City has an ordinance banning the sale of firearm replicas. Despite the law, toy guns still proliferate in the city during the months before December.

Manufacturers are getting bolder, making and selling toy guns similar to the real ones in size and shape.

Flores explained that the program was in line with the coming International Conference on the Campaign against Illicit Small Arms, firearms at the UN headquarters.

From the heart

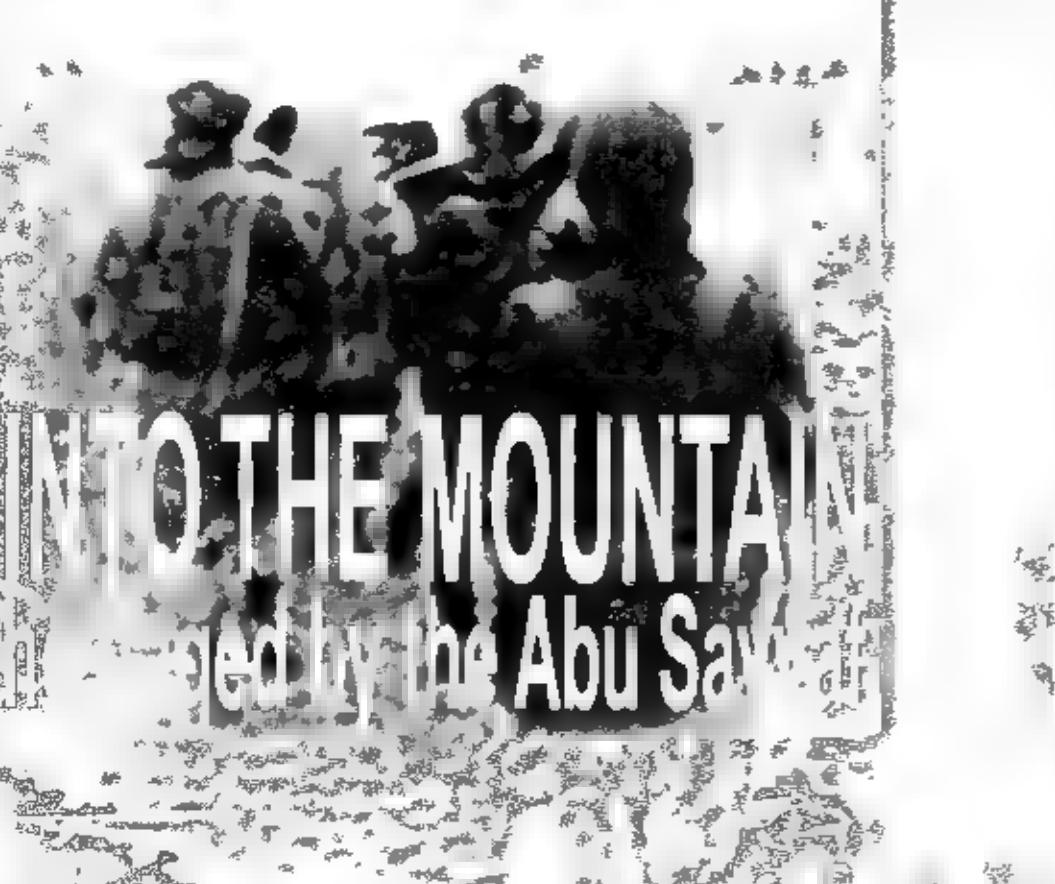

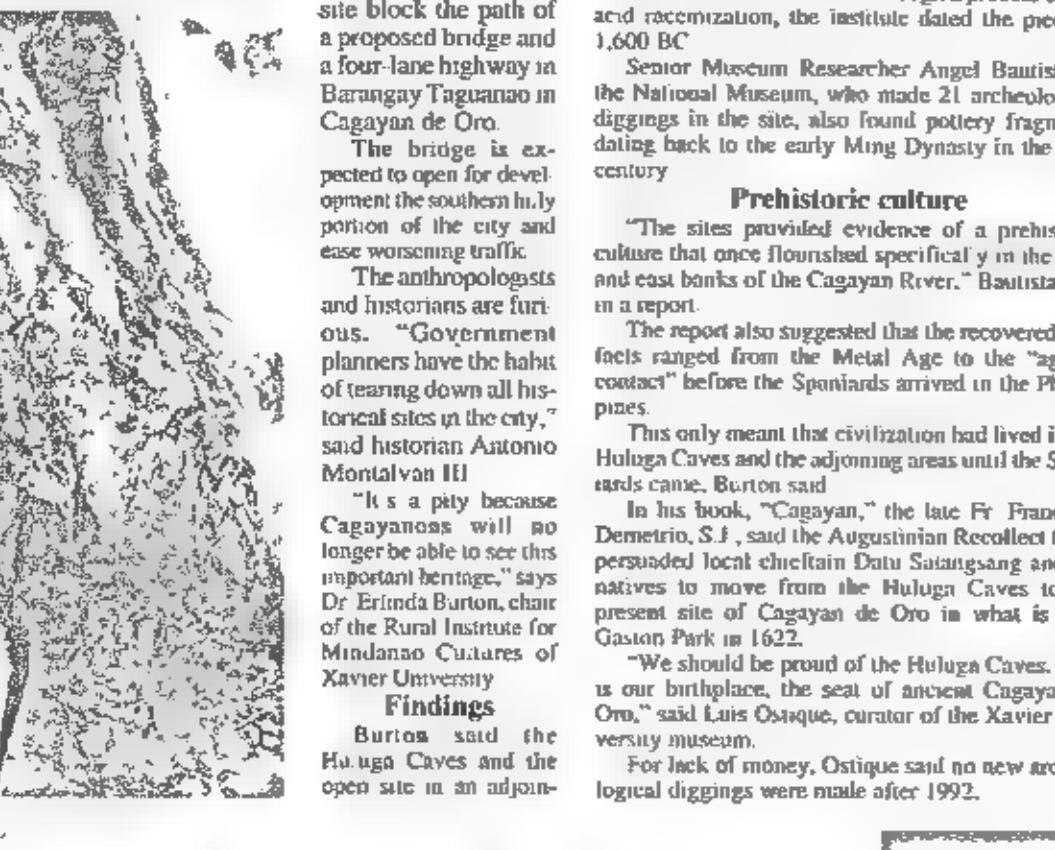

Asked why the toy guns which cannot kill or maim anyone, are being collected, Flores said "we would like to start the campaign from the very heart of it—the love of gun. Love of gun starts when one begins to possess toy guns."

"We would like to hit the minds of young people," he said.

Flores said the UN campaign was proven successful in war-torn countries, like Albania, El Salvador and the Republic of Congo.

In Congo, the UNDP is succeeding in demobilizing combatants by collecting close to 5,000 weapons from ex-militiamen while providing them livelihood opportunities.

Because of the success of the campaign, more countries are requesting for assistance to curb the proliferation of firearms as part of their development agenda.

Crackdown goes on

would be taken was disconcerting given the supposed democratic setup in the country.

But he declined to give the military a time frame for the roundup of suspected Abu Sayyaf members and supporters.

"We are talking here of a war zone. I don't want to second-guess the military ground commander," he said.

On Friday, the President announced before a large business gathering in Makati City that she had ordered the crackdown to finally destroy the Abu Sayyaf.

She said a "state of lawlessness" was prevailing in Basilan, Sulu, Tawi-Tawi and Zamboanga City but that there was no need to declare this or suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus because the crackdown was being done in accordance with the Constitution.

Mosques

"What we want to clarify is that there is no truth to a report that mosques were raided," Tiglao told reporters at a briefing.

The military raided no mosques. In fact, they had very strict orders not to enter mosques.

Tiglao said that under the guidelines issued by Perez, the military should first contact the concerned religious leader if there was a need to enter any mosque.

He said mosques should be entered only in "exceptional cases," such as when armed bandits were seen entering these places of worship to elude the military.

Tiglao said the military was also under strict orders to conduct the crackdown without violating human rights. He said the warrantless arrests were no cause for alarm as suspects would be charged within 36 hours.

But the CHR's Mamauag questioned the conduct of zoning the villages after the Islamic congregational prayer on Friday which, to believers of Islam, is a day of worship and of rest.

"The most severe of the arrest and zoning is fine, but the manner in which it was done is still a violation, and this will create more tension and develop more fear among the civilians," he said.

In Manila, Amrith Ali Ladasan of the Moro-Christian People's Alliance said: "If (Friday's) arrests were a test drive for more warrantless arrests in Western Mindanao, then the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, if not a de facto martial law, may not be far behind."

Ladasan said that while the President did not formally declare a "state of lawlessness" in the specified areas, "her intensive military crackdown may very well result in the abuse of power of enforcers and local officials in Basilan."

Thirteen of those arrested, ages 16 to 47, were identified as Junmuser Araju, Muamri Janjani, William Lam, Dando Suliddad, Nurhina Amil, Alibkar Kamil, Bong Tiraa, Roger Ali, Akgung Salusa, a certain SPO2 Tuu Salisa, Julius Hayudin, Husar Salam, and Loang Hassan.

Nation report on the gains of her administration on July 23. But please, she should not use the Moro issue again.

"If the crackdown on Muslim civilians continues, it will not constitute pogi or ganda points for her, as it did for ousted President Joseph Estrada last year."

Ages 16-47

In Zamboanga City, Southern Command spokesperson Lt. Col. Danilo Servando said members of the 104th Army Brigade in Sulu, headed by Col. Romeo Tolentino, had rounded up 15 suspected Abu Sayyaf members, including a minor.

Thirteen of those arrested, ages 16 to 47, were identified as Junmuser Araju, Muamri Janjani, William Lam, Dando Suliddad, Nurhina Amil, Alibkar Kamil, Bong Tiraa, Roger Ali, Akgung Salusa, a certain SPO2 Tuu Salisa, Julius Hayudin, Husar Salam, and Loang Hassan.

"These are active supporters of the Abu Sayyaf who have long been under surveillance by the military and police. Their arrest was legitimate not indiscriminate," Servando said.

In Basilan, Maj. Alberto Gepilano, civil-military operations officer of the Joint Task Force Comet, dismissed critics of the warrantless arrests.

"Call it what they like, but what we are after here is swiftness in the arrests. And these were done in coordination with barangay officials," he said, adding:

"We consulted with the concerned local government officials, we effected the arrests, we brought (the suspects) to our doctors here and (subjected them to) medical examination and the actual interview, or what is termed interrogation."

Gepilano said the crackdown would continue "until we can get all the 200 listed persons."

From the military standpoint, he said, the arrested persons were active supporters, sympathizers and allies of the Abu Sayyaf and "there is presumption of guilt."

Gepilano also said neither relatives nor members of the media could see those arrested.

"As much as possible, we don't want the interrogation process affected although we understand there is a little inconvenience," he said.

"Our concern is to hasten the process (of investigation), so that those who have not committed any crime can be immediately released. (As for) those who will be found guilty, appropriate charges will be filed against them," he added.

Martial law

Tiglao said Basilan Gov. Wahab Akbar proposed last week the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus and the imposition of martial law in Basilan, but that the President did not approve it.

He also disclosed a plan to set up a special detention facility in Metro Manila "so (those arrested) will have a humane detention."

Zamboanga Mayor Ma. Clara Lobregat said she did not want a repeat in her city of what happened in Basilan.

He added more varieties of trop-

"The city doesn't face a problem with the Abu Sayyaf. The local police and the military are on top of it," Lobregat said.

Defense Secretary Angelo Reyes, Armed Forces chief Gen. Diomedio Villanueva, PNP Director General Leandro Mendoza and State Prosecutor Jovencito Zulu yesterday visited Jolo in Sulu and Isabela City in Basilan to oversee the progress of the campaign against the Abu Sayyaf.

"We are here to see to it that the effort to crack down on the Abu Sayyaf will be instanced. This effort is not nugus ngayon," Reyes told reporters.

Zulu said they would try to finish on Saturday night the summary inquest of all those arrested. Reports from Juliet L. Javellana and Philip C. Tubera in Manila, Julie Alpaza-Intor, Alexander M. Young, Jonathan F. Ma, Allan A. Naval and Anthony Allada, PDI Mindanao Bureau, Reuters cal plants to the Jardin Botanico, further beautifying the grounds. He installed an aviary, a mini-zoo, a monkey cage, a display of plant specimens, and encouraged an American ladies' association to set up a thriving flower market.

When Mehan suddenly passed away in 1912, the 300,000 grateful residents of Manila saw fit to promptly name the Jardin Botanico after him.

In need of preserving

Every year hundreds of thousands of students, mostly poor, troop to the nearby National Museum complex to marvel at artifacts and at botanical specimens that emphasize why archaeological riches like Mehan Garden need preserving.

Both Vidal and Mehan glorified Manila with a garden of scholarly and tourist renown, which Atienza could capitalize and enhance. Instead, apparently bereft of a sense of the past, the mayor is trying to bulldoze and cement over Mehan Garden and all its enduring memories.

The Brent School of his affections

ext of buildings, roads and traffic jams. In many important ways I came back to a different Brent. Its 35-acre (14 hectares) campus had only 100 students, the majority of them boarders. There were only six wooden buildings, all painted cream with dark green trim. Dotted around the campus was a forest of beautiful pine trees. Of the six original buildings from 1941, only four remain. The girls' dorm and the gym were both destroyed by the 1990 earthquake.

The Brent campus remains an oasis of pines. Since 1941, the buildings have doubled in number and so has the student body, a much lower percentage of whom are now boarders. But the greatest change has taken place in the makeup of the student body.

No Filipinos

When I was at Brent, we had two wealthy Spanish boys from Manila and four British boys and girls. All the rest of us were Americans, the sons and daughters of government officials, of Army and Navy officers, of engineers and managers in the nearby Baguio gold mines. Not a single Filipino attended Brent. At the time, none of us kids thought much about that fact. But today we recognize that Brent was a true pristine, all-out colonial school. The only Filipinos in sight were the houseboys, the kitchen staff and the groundskeeper.

Today one-third of the students are Filipino citizens. When the US military bases were closed in 1990, all the Army and Navy families left the Philippines, taking with them around 20 Brent students. Brent now has only a handful of white Americans. But 18 other countries are represented, including Korea, Indonesia, Japan and Australia. Brent is now a truly cosmopolitan, interracial school. I'm sorry we didn't have Filipino students back in 1941. We would have learned much more about the country and its people and our school would have been much richer for it.

Belonging

Before I flew out to the Philippines, I phoned two women who had been juniors when I was a senior. I asked them what they thought was special about Brent.

Barrie Taylor (now Sebastian) said: "I was a very shy English girl, a 13-year-old freshman, arriving for the first time in coed school. Frightening! But when I got there, all the older girls were kind and helpful. They made me feel welcome right away. I could belong to everything. I couldn't sing, but I was allowed to be in the choir. Nothing was closed to us. The greatest gift from Brent was self-confidence. It's lasted my whole life."

Betsy McCreary said: "For me it was instant company. I lived an isolated life in Nolo, but suddenly at Brent there were people all around me. There weren't very many of us, but we were very close to each other. I loved it. I couldn't wait for September to come around so that I could go back to Brent. Our whole life was there on campus. I liked that small world. It was like having your own neighborhood, your own little country. We thought Brent was better than anything else—and it was."

As for me, I had attended a grand junior high school and a giant high school in Washington D.C., where my only accomplishment was to get good grades. I wasn't good enough to make any of the athletic teams. The schools and the classes were so big that I never felt part of anything. But when I got to Brent, suddenly I was on both the basketball and baseball teams, and in my senior year I was editor of the magazine and the yearbook. Like Barrie, I felt I could be part of everything. The school was so small—only seven seniors, only 40 in the entire high school—that we all felt we were needed and important. We all belonged.

Spirit of adventure

The small classes did wonders for education. In my senior year I took two classes, fourth year Latin and trigonometry, where I was the only student. The teachers had to be adventurous to begin with, since they signed up for two or three years in a foreign country they had never seen before.

That spirit of adventure came through in the classrooms, which were livelier and exciting than anything I had experienced in Washington. The teachers lived with us on campus and ate all their meals with us, rotating through the dining room, each teacher spending one week at each table. An extra closeness developed between students and faculty.

Very strict

However, the rules under which we lived were very strict. They had to be.

This was a church school and a coed school, and the social and sexual standards of that distant day were fiercely maintained. Chaperones for the girls were required on all occasions. When they walked over from the girls' dorm for breakfast, chaperones walked with them. The same when they walked back to the girls' dorm at night after dinner. They could not go to Saturday afternoon movies in Baguio without a chaperone. The Friday night dances in the girls' dorm always had two chaperones, one male teacher, one female teacher. Since it was the Swing Era, most of the tunes were fast, bouncy and sexually unrestrained.

But when a slow, dreamy record was put on the victrola—Glenn Miller's—the chaperones sprang to red alert attention. They made certain that no close bodily contact occurred, no struggling whatsoever.

Boys and girls had classes together. And in the evening before dinner when we stood around the dining room waiting for the ring of the headmaster's bell, telling us to be silent for grace, the junior and senior boys were allowed to visit with the junior and the senior girls near the girls' tables. However, it would have been quite improper for the girls to visit at the boys' tables.

Under all these circumstances, small wonder that almost no boy-girl couples existed in the normal teenage way. There was no opportunity for such a natural thing to happen. However, one such couple did come into being during my senior year and since I was half of that couple, I can tell the story with accuracy and confidence.

Birthday rites

Back then, Brent had a tradition that survives to this day, although in a slightly altered form. On a student's birthday, he or she was given a cake with a candle. The student blew out the candle, cut off the four corners, put them on plates and walked around the dining room, handing out the corners to his or her most favorite people. It was considered acceptable to give one corner to a teacher, but more than one would have been viewed as a disgusting attempt to curry favor. Great suspense accompanied this ceremony as we all waited to see who would get the corners.

In my day, the birthday person, before cutting the cake, had to stand up on a chair and make a brief speech. That is no longer required. In my day, the corners were always handed out in the dining room in front of students and faculty. Together we thought up a new nickname for her, since "Buddy" struck both of us as too childish. She became Ginny and she persuaded everybody to call her that.

To the astonishment of her parents, I am sure, she appeared in the yearbook as Ginny and was voted "Most Romantic Girl" by a huge margin. I was voted "Most Romantic Boy," my favorite uncle ever.

Last week the Most Romantic Girl and the Most Romantic Boy spoke on the phone for this article. She now goes by her real name, Louise, but we both affectionately remembered our Ginny and Ralph days at Brent.

Climactic events

The two climactic events of my visit took place on the same day, one in the afternoon and one in the evening of March 30, 2001. The afternoon event was the unveiling of the statue of Bishop Brent. Standing on a pedestal next to the main driveway leading up to the school, the statue was contributed by the Sobrepresa Foundation whose founder thought this is a fitting gift to the school not only as a memorial to its founder but also for the friendship of his own father with Bishop Brent.

The entire school assembled to witness the ceremony. The Philippine Military Academy band played the Philippine National anthem as a procession of students carried the flags of the 18 countries now represented in the school. They came to a halt in a straight line behind the statue and planted their flag-staffs on the ground.

And then, since this was a Baguio afternoon, of course it started to rain. Out came umbrellas that were held over the principal players: the Episcopal Bishop of the Philippines, the Canadian ambassador (Bishop Brent was born in Canada); the American Embassy representative (Brent became an American citizen); the president of the Foundation that donated the statue and my father.

As Don Holmes observed later there were not enough umbrellas to go around, so the headmaster got wet. The flag-bearers continued to stand at attention, as they had been instructed. They held their banners vertically erect, ignoring the rain—all except one boy who tears do not think of money even if we have it."

The umbrella program had an annual budget of P2 million in its first year. Prominent alumni, including government officials, having stopped giving donations, it is now down to P800,000.

The Gurong Pahinungod has a separate budget from the education department that totals around P3 million, but this barely meets the needs of the teachers and schools.

It was set up in 1994 to prove that "UP has not lost its soul" in the face of accusations that it was now catering more to AB students and less to the needy ones.

Expectations

The volunteer teachers, some of them non-education graduates, take pedagogical courses and attend workshops on issue analysis, community integration, psychosocial processing and social investigation.

They are then sent to teach in obscure parts of the country, where few professional teachers dare go and where life is hard for the city-bred.

More than anything, we had to live up to public expectations of a UP student," said Pahinungod coordinator Karen Panol, 25, an ex-volunteer.

"You ignore pressure from outside to do something else that will earn. Everything is okay as long as you're happy with what you do and it gives you a sense of purpose and meaning in your life," she said.

The volunteers are deployed in pairs, usually in Batanes, Apuyao, Abra, Oriental Mindoro, Palawan, Romblon, Masbate, Catanduanes, Marinduque, Bohol, Compostela Valley, Maguindanao, Lanao del Sur, Agusan del Sur, Sulu and Tawi-Tawi.

They live with foster families and survive as the townfolk do: build a fire to cook breakfast of rice and eggplant or an egg, fetching pails of water from a well for a bath.

They depend on the radio for updates on Metro Manila because they live in areas where the latest issue of a newspaper is three days old and telephones are 20 minutes away.

Illusions

Mainly Andu, a BS English graduate of UP Diliman, was moved to take on the experience after discovering the "uniqueness" of academic life at the state university, where, she said, those from private and Metro Manila-based schools dominated the grades.

"I realized I had to teach, and teach well," she said, adding: "I had to go back to my high school (in Bicol), even if only for two years, and teach them things I never learned in high school, to make

Touring car returns to Batangas

THE ZED Gulf Oil MP Turbo Racing Team tries to extend its winning run in the 9th and 10th rounds of the Shell Philippine National Touring Car Championship and the Philippine Junior Touring Car Championship today at the Batangas Racing Circuit in Rosario, Batangas.

PJTCC frontrunner Carlos Anton is eyeing the title this early since a victory will make him the virtual series champion. Anton snared the series leadership from TEC ace driver Carlos Pastor by winning rounds 7 and 8 in Subic in June.

Mike Potenciano, meanwhile, will try to prove that his win in the 9th round of the Petron Blaze Super Saloon Championship series in Subic last weekend was no fluke. Potenciano finally got his Honda Civic into groove to claim pole position. The multi-titled driver set a blistering pace in the early going of the round 9 to lead his closest rival by more than seven seconds in one segment of the race.

The Zed Gulf Oil MP Turbo racing team's other supporters this year are BLTB Co., AER Engine Rebuilders, Abante newspaper, Rota Wheels, Goma King Trading, Yebey.com, Bavaria Motors Works.

Actor Moching Gutierrez has his sights set on the novice title of the PJTCC races. Alex Padua, on the other hand, is no pushover in Class C after scoring two victories in the opening rounds.

Karting titlist and veteran saloon racing campaigner George Apacible remains the darkhorse in the PJTCC Class B races. Mon Lindo, a standout karter and circuit driver is a strong contender in the Class C of the PNTCC races.

Rubillar stakes crown

ONE of the three mainers in the triple WBC International Championship treat on July 28 at the Casino Filipino-Paradise is the bout between Juanito Rubi, Inc. and Takahiko Mizuno of Japan.

Rubillar, a native of Mati, Davao Oriental, stakes his lightweight crown for the second time, after his successful defense on April 28 when he scored a 5th round knockout off Fahsang Pow Pongsawang of Thailand in Kidapawan, North Cotabato.

Scheduled for 12 rounds, the triple treat dubbed as "Fist of Fury sa Casino Filipino-Paradise" is promoted by Gabriel "Bebot" Elorde Jr., and supported by Thunderbird and Philippine Charity Sweepstakes Office (PCSO). This event will also feature former world flyweight king Macum Tuifacao against international flyweight titlist Randy Mangabat and bantamweight champion Ricky Gayomo against Abner Cordero.

Tickets for the "Fist of Fury" may be exchanged with an equivalent bonus bet certificate at the concierge section of the Casino Filipino-Paradise. For inquiries, please call tel. No. 825-7229.

Mika's career goes on SILVERSTONE, England—Two-time Formula One series champion Mika Hakkinen says he's not retiring. But whether he will be with McLaren-Mercedes next season is another matter.

Hakkinen, who will be 32 in September, has had an abysmal season: in 10 races he has only nine points; leader Michael Schumacher has 78—and has crossed the finish line only three times in his breakdown-prone McLaren.

The Finn had the quickest time in Friday practice for the British Grand Prix. But that means little. Sunday results count. He lives comfortably in Monte Carlo, Monaco, with his wife, Erja, and young son, Hugo, and, with two world titles to his name, motivation may be a problem with speculation this will be his last season. Ritchie shutout

PITTSBURGH— Todd Ritchie overpowered the reeling Kansas City Royals en route to his second shutout of the season and took a no-hitter into the ninth inning as the Pittsburgh Pirates pulled out a 1-0 victory in interleague play on Friday.

Aramis Ramirez singled in the winning run in the bottom of the ninth to give David Littlefield a winning start after taking over as general manager earlier in the day.

One of baseball's hottest pitchers over the last month, Ritchie (6-9) lost his no-hit bid when Luis Alicea rolled a single through the hole on the right side of the infield with one out in the top of the ninth. Reuters

Jordan joins 'pick' in practice

WASHINGTON—Michael Jordan practiced for the first time since breaking two ribs a month ago on the same day No. 1 overall draft pick Kwame Brown signed a three-year, $11.9 million contract.

Brown signed the contract in Jordan's office on Friday, then both suited up for the Wizards' first practice of a three-day minicamp.

At the end of practice, Brown made his first pressure NBA shots: two free throws that kept the team from having to run six wind sprints.

Brown is a 2.11-meter (6-foot-11), 108-kilogram (240-pound) center from Glynn Academy in Brunswick, Georgia. At 19, he is the youngest player taken with the first overall pick.

Jordan, the Wizards' president of basketball operations, has been exploring a possible comeback. He broke two ribs in a pickup game last month, and he wasn't expected to resume workouts for another two weeks.

Jordan left the court before Friday's practice was open to the reporters, but Brown said his boss showed no effects of the injury.

"He worked out. He's Michael Jordan, he looks good," Brown said. "He got knocked on the ground the first time he started running the whole court."

Ewing, Grant Orlando-bound

NEW YORK—Depending on how you look at it, the Orlando Magic could be picking up 30 years of experience or 75 years of age.

According to the Orlando Sentinel, center Patrick Ewing, a future Hall of Famer who turns 39 early next month, is coming to Orlando and 36-year-old power forward Horace Grant, a four-time NBA champion, is likely to join him. Their experience and size could help the Magic.

UP whips Adamson; FEU prevails

UNIVERSITY of the Philippines survived a bad case of opening-day jitters to thump Adamson, 72-63, yesterday at the start of the 64th UAAP Men's Basketball Championships before a jampacked crowd at the Araneta Coliseum.

Unused to the highly charged atmosphere, the Maroons played with heavy legs in the early going, allowing the lightly regarded Falcons to keep the game close

But things started to change after the half-time break.

CARMONA, Cavite—Cassius Casas, the star from the South, and Mars Pucay, the answer from the North, shared the lead yesterday after 54 holes of the College Assurance Plan-Legends Classic.

The 34-year-old Casas fired a six-under-par 66 and Pucay a 67 as the duo braced for a dramatic duel going to today's final round of the Tour's fifth leg at the fabled Southwoods course.

Again displaying his new-found form from a new-found swing that earned him P1.5 million in winning the Philippine Open two weeks ago, Casas hit 17 greens yesterday for a 205 total that deadlocked him with Pucay.

Casas' 66 was his seventh straight sub-par round, counting his four straight under-par rounds at Wack Wack.

The 32-year-old Pucay, whose claim to fame was a runner-up finish in the 1997 Philippine Open in Baguio won by lefty Kevin Wentworth of the United States, banged home 8 birdies in his 33.34 rounds.

Pucay and Casas will tee off today three strokes up on Elmer Salvador and two-day leader Jerome Delariarte, the hot amateur the first two days, who skidded to a 74.

Salvador fired a 70 for 208, the same output of Delariarte, who earlier did 65-69 as he threatened to become the first amateur to win on the newly established Tour.

Delariarte, who held a four-stroke lead as the star of the day, relinquished the upper hand with back-to-back bogeys on Nos. 11-12. He stumbled into a no-par, double-bogey on the 18th to typify his return to earth.

Rodrigo Cueto and Dina Cruz closed in with their identical 69s for 209 in the tournament sponsored chiefly by College Assurance Plan, with support from Ericsson Telecommunications, Smart Zed, Callaway, Southwoods Manor, Publicis Spark and Wilson.

Meanwhile, the team of Edwin Sanchez and Derrick Gamboa won the pro-am side-event by a whopping 10 strokes with their net 115. Rodrigo Cueto and Nitoy Escario placed second with a 125.

Still in contention with 18 holes left are Benjie Magada (71) and Vic Santra (67), who were a shot back at 210.

Angelo Que rallied with a 68 to move to within four strokes of Delariante, his Southwoods teammate. The back-to-back national champion was alone at 212.

The scores:

205—M. Pucay (73-65-67), F. Casas (71-68-66); 208—J. Delariarte (65-69-74), E. Salvador (69-69-70); 209—R. Cueto (73-67-69), D. Cruz (72-68-69); 210—B. Magada (72-67-71), V. Santra (70-73-67); 212—A. Cue (70-74-68); 213—D. Zarate (71-70-72); 214—R. Pascualin (73-69-72); 215—G. Rosales (71-70-74), E. Sanchez (72-69-74); 217—C. Villaroman (76-71-71); 218—E. Ababa (70-70-78); R. Nationals to play at Canlubang North

MEMBERS of the newly-formed national team for the Southeast Asian Games lead the entry roster for the sixth leg of the Titleist-FootJoy National Amateur Circuit on July 17 at Canlubang North.

Juvic Pagunsan, Marvin Dumandan, Jay Bayron and team alternate Gene Bondoc are expected to slug it out for the top plum in the 72-hole championship division of the tournament backed chiefly by Titleist and FootJoy through Dynamic Sports and Leisure Corp.

Ruby Walker-Choco and Carmelita Vilhorman, meanwhile, will resume their rivalry in the ladies championship division.

Pagunsan is the solid favorite since Canlubang is his home course. The other members of the powerhouse Canlubang squad are also entered.

Action in the 36-hole handicap play competitions for Groups 2 and 3 also kicks off on July 17.

The 54-hole ladies championship division gets going on July 18 while those in Group 1 and 4 play together with the ladies play in the last two rounds Thursday and Friday.

Interested players may register at all Chris T outlets or proceed to Canlubang before their scheduled

tee-off

The impressive showing of Dumandan, Bayron and Bondoc in the circuit earned them slots in the national team. Dumandan topped the previous leg at Mimosa.

Super Bike: Alberto guns for Jao's lead

TOTTI Alberto of Castrol-Access Plus tries to conjure his old magic in the resumption of the 2001 National Super Bike Championships today at the Batangas Racing Circuit in Rosario, Batangas.

Riding a Ducati 748SP, Alberto seeks an all-important first win in this prestigious 12-part series organized by the Batangas Racing Circuit Association (BRCA) and sanctioned by the National Motorcycle Sports and Safety Association (Namsa).

The 31-year-old Alberto is only 10 points behind perennial rival Jolet Jao in the overall standings so the strength of has two runner-up and one fourth-place finishes in the past three rounds.

Alberto has 47 points against Jao's 57 points.

"It will be interesting to watch how Jolet and I will fare against each other anew in the long and challenging Batangas racetrack," said Alberto, who snatched the overall championship in 1999.

Alberto put up an impressive performance in the kickoff round in Batangas and crossed the finish line in second place. But he struggled in the next round due to engine trouble and limped home in fourth place behind Rod Scott, Jao and Rey Relatio.

In Subic, he started in pole position after topping the previous day's qualifying round and finished mere seconds behind Jao despite the wet track conditions.

Alberto's teammate, Thomas Ryan, will also be one of the riders to watch in the novice category against Wacky del Rosario, Jose Reyes IV, Randy Ortiz and Paul Gococal.

The race winner gets 20 points, the runner-up 17 points and the third placer 15 points.

The overall standings after three rounds:

Mehan Gardens parking complex project illegal, say councilors

BY JEROME ANING

THE CONSTRUCTION of a multi-story parking complex next to the historic Mehan Gardens in Manila could be illegal, according to documents obtained by the Inquirer.

Two city councilors who refused to be identified also claimed the contract made by Manila Mayor Lito Abenza and the Park 'N Ride Inc. on Jan. 29 was never ratified by the council and that it never passed the city committee on transportation.

The council approved City Ordinance No. 8002 on Aug. 18, 2000, setting aside the lot for parking purposes and authorizing the mayor to enter into a contract with another party.

The ordinance also required that the contract be approved by the city council.

But according to the nine-page contract, the mayor not only authorized Park 'N Ride to build the parking facility, he also leased the lot to the firm.

According to the contract, the city government will lease 5,979.30 square meters of the Mehan Gardens—between the Metropolitan Theater and Basa Street—to Park 'N Ride for 25 years under a build-operate-transfer scheme.

The contract was signed by Atienza and the Makati City-based Park 'N Ride, represented by its president, Vicente Javier. It was attested by the secretary to the mayor Emmanuel Sison and witnessed by city legal officer Melchor Monsod and another person whose signature cannot be deciphered.

Under the agreement, Park 'N Ride was required to invest no less than P48.5 million in the project. The company was also asked to pay P89,689.50 in rent each month, subject to readjustment at the rate of 20 percent every three years.

Park 'N Ride was to pay City Hall 10 percent of the total net profit that it would derive from the parking complex, subject to MEHAN/A22

CADETS walked out of training at the University of Sto. Tomas in the July 1 boycott that kicked off the continuing protest.

Anti-ROTC cadets cry harassment

BY PHILIP C. TUBEZA
AND ALCLIN PAPA

MILITANT students clamoring for the abolition of the Reserve Officers Training Corps at the Far Eastern University are complaining of harassment from military police cadets.

Lucile Gypsy Zabala, chair of Stand FEU, yesterday told reporters that some MP cadets and members of their rival youth group, Sanlakas Youth, beat up two of their members on July 10.

She claimed the MPs also threatened Stand FEU members so they would not stay at their organization's meeting place inside the school.

"These incidents show a clear manifestation of the misuse of power by ROTC officers," Zabala said in a news conference yesterday.

She said it is not farfetched for FEU students to suffer the fate of Mark Nelson Chua, the UST engineering student who was kidnapped and murdered after he exposed alleged anomalies in the UST ROTC.

Zabala said MP cadets ganged up on activists Julius Caesar Tan and Zeus Teodoro about 7 p.m. Tuesday on R. Papa Street in Sampaloc, Manila.

The two were having a snack after participating in an anti-ROTC protest action when MP cadets and Sanlakas Youth members, who were said to be drunk, hit them with bottles and stones, Zabala claimed.

Police managed to arrest three of the suspects while Tan and Teodoro were taken to the Jose Reyes Memorial Hospital, Zabala said, adding the harassment did not end there.

On Friday, a Stand FEU member identified only as Lopez was also threatened if he continued to campaign for the ROTC's abolition, Zabala said. Stand FEU members also got threatening text messages on their cellular phones.

"Try to make an appearance in FEU and we'll wipe you all out," Zabala quoted one message as saying.

The national militant youth group Anakbayan said thousands of students would take to the streets on July 23, when President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo delivers her State of the Nation Address.

"We will march to Congress by the thousands on July 23 to show (legislators) how serious we are (in our call) to abolish the ROTC," said Apolinario Alvarez, Anakbayan secretary general.

Anakbayan is set to present to congressmen a petition to abolish the ROTC with about 1 million signatures.

"We will urge Congress to pass a bill on the abolition of the ROTC," Alvarez said, adding that they would continue with their protest actions in the schools and on streets to "ensure its demise."

Anakbayan plans to hold ROTC walkouts and barricades in several universities and colleges today.

Deranged man stabs mother to death

BY PHILIP C. TUBEZA

A 25-YEAR-OLD deranged man stabbed his 62-year-old mother to death Friday night in Caloocan City.

Widowed meat vendor Modesta Yute, of Bagong Silang in Caloocan City, was repeatedly stabbed by her own son, Antonio, said investigator PO3 Romeo Mata of Caloocan police.

Mata said the stabbing happened at 10:35 p.m. Friday in the widow's home.

For no apparent reason, Yute's son took a knife, approached his mother and stabbed her repeatedly until she fell unconscious, Mata said.

The victim was brought to the Nonadoss Hospital where she was declared dead on arrival due to the multiple stab wounds in the body, Mata said.

He said the suspect's mental instability might have led him to kill his own mother.

Antonio's sister, Florencia, said the suspect had been brought to the National Institute for Mental Health several times because of his mental condition.

Mandaluyong police chief replaced

BY BLANCHE S. RIVERA

IN WHAT could be a portent of a revamp to come, the police chief of Mandaluyong city was replaced yesterday reportedly for failing to comply with some of the mayor's orders.

Supt. Jose Gentiles, who headed the Mandaluyong police force for a year, took a leave of absence from duty "to settle something important abroad," according to his subordinates.

He was replaced by Supt. Socorro Ikhala, chief directorial staff at the Eastern Police District headquarters, who assumed the top police post in the city yesterday.

Chief Supt. George Alito, EPD director, said Gentiles submitted a letter seeking permission to take an indefinite leave of absence but he did not say for what reason.

Alito said Gentiles recommended his deputy, Chief Insp. Jose Carlito Rayo, to take over his post, but the EPD official declined the recommendation.

"We can't appoint a junior major because Mandaluyong is a city and it entails big responsibilities," Alito said.

It was said Gentiles filed for a leave to give reelected Mayor Benhur Abalos a free hand in choosing a police chief in his second term as Mandaluyong's chief executive.

Unconfirmed reports, however, said Gentiles opted to leave his post because he failed to meet the mayor's demand to rid the city of jueteng operators.

Student, 18, shot dead by 16-year-old

BY PHILIP C. TUBEZA

FRIDAY THE 13th proved fatal for graduating high school senior Reuel E. Martico.

Martico, 18, was on his way home after playing basketball Friday night when a 16-year-old out-of-school neighbor shot him with a homemade shotgun (stumpak).

But when police arrested the suspect later that night, he claimed he was just playing with the improvised gun when it suddenly fired.

Martico, of 326-F San Roque 1, Barangay Pag-asa, Quezon City, died from a shotgun wound in the right buttock, said PO2 Jojo Miranda, of the Central Police District's Criminal Investigation Unit.

Martico was walking home about 7 p.m. when the 16-year-old approached him and pointed the stumpak at Martico's buttocks, police said.

But the gun went off and Martico collapsed on the road, crying in pain. The 16-year-old fled with the shotgun, PO2 Miranda said.

Witness Anthony de los Santos took the victim to the Philippine Children's Medical Center where he died at 11:30 p.m. Friday.

"He lost too much blood," Miranda said. "Ten people volunteered to give him blood but it was too late."

Before Martico died, he told his relatives it was the 16-year-old boy who shot him, Miranda said.

Barangay security officials caught up with the suspect at 1:15 a.m. in Talipapa, also in Barangay Pag-asa.

The suspect told investigators he was just playing with the gun when it accidentally went off.

"He said he just wanted to tease Martico," Miranda said. "But he pulled the string, or the trigger, of the improvised shotgun and it went off."

The victim's body was later brought to the Philippine National Police Crime Laboratory for autopsy.

Miranda said police are looking for the stumpak which the suspect used in the shooting. The suspect said he gave it to somebody before he tried to escape.

Las Piñas pawnshop robbed

A PAWNSHOP in Las Piñas City lost P1.5 million in cash to robbers early yesterday morning.

According to the initial investigation by PO3 Jandale Sulit of the Las Piñas City Criminal Investigation Division, the Cobiana Lhuillier Pawnshop branch near the Alabang-Zapote Flyover was burglarized between 3 a.m. and 4 a.m.

Pawnshop branch manager Marivic Sorongan, 34, told police she opened the store for the day when she was surprised to find the place in disarray.

She also discovered the steel door of the pawnshop had been destroyed. Investigators believe that the thieves entered the shop through the door.

Sorongan proceeded to the shop's vault and discovered that the expensive jewelry stored inside was gone. She then immediately reported the theft to the police. Alvin Papa

The man was brought to the Mary Johnston Hospital but he was pronounced dead upon arrival.

SPO4 Ernesto Jose Jr. of the Western Police District homicide section reported yesterday.

Landero's wallet, wedding ring and cellular phone were missing, police said.

The victim's younger sister Glenda told investigators she and her friend Beverly de la Cerna last saw Landero alive in their apartment about 11 a.m. Friday.

Landero was said to be talking to a man identified only as Allan when the said the victim was at least 30 years old, about 5-foot-3, shirtless and wearing green short pants. He also wore a fancy earring on the left ear and an Ifugao necklace.

No one among the residents interviewed by police could say where the suspect came from or who stabbed him.

The man was heard moaning in pain and begging for help around 1 a.m. A concerned resident, Marcelo Legarang, brought the victim to the hospital.

The victim was the second man to die in the hands of still unknown killers in Tondo this week.

On Wednesday at the corner of Dagupan Extension and Bontoc streets in Gagalangin, Roland Johnson, 35 and single, was sleeping inside his jeepney (RVZ-639) at around 5 a.m. when he was shot.

Johnson, who suffered a bullet wound in the neck, shouted for help but no one heeded him. Policemen later found Johnson dead in a sitting position on the pavement.

VIEWFINDER
Nestor U. Torre

TIME was when TV hosts were TV hosts, and show biz newsmakers were show biz newsmakers. The hosts interviewed the newsmakers, and that was that.

These days, however, the dividing line between host and newsmaker has practically vanished. Look at Miriam Quiambao, who hosts GMA 7's "Xtra! Xtra!" recently she broke her engagement with her longtime boyfriend, and she became the news.

To complicate matters, some reports had it that there was a third party involved, and the happened to be none other than her cohost, Paolo Bediones. So, for a time there, Paolo became the news, too.

To really thicken the brew, Paolo interviewed Miriam on this score on his other TV show, "S-Files," where she denied that he was responsible for the break-up. So, during that interview both Miriam and Paolo were the news, while Paolo was also the host asking the questions!

Also confusing is the case of Janice de Belen, now Paolo's "S-Files" cohost, interviewing ex-lover Aga Muhlach about his recent wedding. To keep the fans interested, the interview made references to the past that Janice and Aga shared, so the line dividing host from newsmaker was blurred once more.

Take note that these two instances have happened on GMA 7 shows. Is the channel bent on changing the rules of the game governing TV hosting and reportage?

This is the problem when TV hosts are celebrities themselves. Granted viewers may like this sort of thing because it shows the "human" side of TV hosts.

But whatever happened to the objectivity that interviewers are supposed to have, so that they can get to the unalloyed truth in a news event? If a TV host is involved in some way in what he's "investigating," how could he possibly remain objective?

TV people should discuss the merits and demerits of this incipient trend, either to nip it in the bud, or to make sure that it doesn't get out of hand.

Masters of laughter

THE COMEDY Club at Greenbelt Mall showcases stand-up comics every Thursday. John Lapid is featured on July 19, while Giselle Sanchez has the spotlight all to herself on July 26.

Shows start at 7 p.m. at the Greenbelt Mall Theater lobby.

Aside from featuring name comics, let's hope that Comedy Club will also provide a venue for deserving comedic talents who have yet to make their mark on the show biz scene.

Years ago, when we caught then unknown comedians in comedy clubs in the States, little did we know that the brilliant young talents we saw then would later become big stars, like Robin Williams and Whoopi Goldberg. It could happen at the local comedy club, too.

'Geowatch' on National Geographic Channel

AS ASIA rushes headlong into the 21st century, the fast pace of development has threatened much of the environment, effecting major changes in the lives of some people. The National Geographic Channel explores these changes and their impact in "Geowatch" Asia every Monday at 10 p.m. this month (July 16, 23 and 30).

Each episode features stories that detail efforts to protect wildlife, environment and culture. Contact addresses are also provided for viewers who want to help in this regard, by working together with the organizations mentioned in the program.

Feedback

FROM Ester A. Arevalo of Makati City: "Can you find out if there will be a screenwriting contest I can join this year? I have written some scripts that I think have a fighting chance, and I want to know if the judges will agree with me!"

NUT: Well, Ms. Arevalo, you're in luck. Star Cinema has announced its second annual screenwriting competition. And the Film Development Foundation of the Philippines could hold a nationwide contest this year. Also, the Palanca Awards has a Film Script division that will be calling for entries early next year.

President to host Palace dinner for cast of Mikey's movie

SHOWBIZ TIDBITS

PRESIDENT Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo continues to support the show biz career of her son Mikey Arroyo.

After tomorrow night's premiere of Mikey's movie, "Mahal Kita, Kahit Sino Ka Pa," President Macapagal will host a late-dinner party in Malacañang for the cast. The premiere will be held at SM Southmall in Las Piñas.

The President, however, will not attend the screening. Mikey said his mom prefers to see the movie during its regular run which starts July 18.

"Para naman kumita ang pelikula ko," Mikey said with a smile.

For the first time in his four-year show biz career, Mikey gets stellar billing as leading man in "Mahal Kita, Kahit Sino Ka Pa," which pairs him with Judy Ann Santos. It is directed by Jose "Kaka" Balagtas.

Mikey is so excited about show biz that even if he has been elected vice governor of Pampanga, he continues to accept movie assignments. He had been doing second-fiddle roles, mostly in action flicks, until the MMG movie came along.

"I don't normally get this nervous before, but it's different pola salaga when you are the leading man because you are worried about the outcome of the movie," he said.

"I enjoy this business because it helps me make new friends. When my mom ran for senator in 1992, we got a lot of help from show biz people. I don't find people in the business hard to work with."

Mikey gets criticized more for his recent venture into politics.

"I've only been in politics for four months and I'm already barraged with criticism," he said. "It's not an easy way of life, but I never really expected it to be easy. I'm happy with what I am doing right now. I'm prepared for things like this."

"My heart belongs in show biz because I'm happy with my acting career. Politics is harder because I have the mandate of the people. They voted for me."

He says his mom is easily affected when she reads negative write-ups about him.

"She's in agony when people hit me," he said. "I know she has the problems of the country on her mind, so I feel bad when she also worries about me."

As a politician, Mikey is aware that he will face more criticism than he has ever faced before.

"Some people are saying that I've changed since my mom became president. There was even an allegation that I'm a jueteng coddler in Pampanga.

"My mom questions me when she reads or hears about these things. She hates it, of course, because she is very careful about protecting my grandfather's legacy. She always tells me that when someone hits you, you should turn the other cheek."

In Pampanga, Mikey recently launched his first project, Mikey Against Poverty. He has other livelihood programs, including farming, health, education, cooperatives and feeding. His platform is "transparency, accountability and good work ethics." Eventually, he wants to outline his identity as President Macapagal's son.

"I hope that people will take me seriously in what I'm doing right now," he said. "It's not an easy task, but I'm doing my best."

With Mikey's political career, not a few are speculating that he just might follow in his mother's footsteps and aim for the presidency in the future. But the 32-year-old vice governor denies he has presidential ambitions, for now.

"I'm so preoccupied with doing a good job," he said. "I don't think that far ahead. My mom always tells me to be sincere and have the best of intentions because you will never go wrong."

Three-time bank prexy used to earn ₱1 a day

BY MARGIE QUILMPO-ESPINO

WITH eight other brothers and sisters that his parents had to feed, Peter B. Favila felt that he had to pitch in to help his parents and at the same time earn extra money for himself.

So in his senior year of high school at the University of Sto. Tomas, he worked as a server at the school cafeteria.

"During recess, I would sell soft drinks. I have a big family and I thought I should help out," said Favila, president of Allied Banking Corp., the finance arm of tycoon Lucio Tan.

Favila earned 50 centavos every recess. Since there were two breaks, he went home with ₱1 a day and free food. Soft drinks at that time cost 10 centavos a bottle.

Having tasted how it was to earn, Favila took on more jobs throughout college, which he also spent in UST. At one time he was at the college registrar's office, then at the accounting office where he did clerical work.

Since work took up a lot of his time, college became his part-time preoccupation. He worked from morning to five in the afternoon. In the evenings, he went to class.

"I was allowed to leave at 4:45 p.m. to attend my classes, which were from five to nine," Favila says.

Despite his heavy schedule, the intelligent and driven Favila still managed to finish college in four years. His salary at the time was up from ₱1 to ₱120 a month—enough to subsidize his inition and pay for his allowance and other needs.

"My parents sent me to school but I took care of buying the supplies and my allowance with my salary. I got used to doing that," he relates.

It was not too much of a burden for Favila as he has always been something of a workaholic. Even as a child he liked doing chores and odd jobs for relatives.

London's well-heeled use gold in food, pampering

LONDON—Gold is worn usually as a sign of wealth, but the well-heeled of London and its environs have been eating it for years for health reasons and now believe it has anti-aging benefits when used in facial treatments.

"In the last four or five months there has been an upsurge in what people do with gold," said Bruce Alexander, joint owner of the Archipelago restaurant in London's West End.

"We have been using it for many years here—we try to do something different with food," he added.

A lot of the food prepared at Archipelago is geared toward healthy eating—such as kangaroo meat, scorpions and locusts—and gold is used for the same reasons.

Alexander said the metal, when consumed regularly, was good for circulation, cleared the blood and enhanced the mind.

Among the dishes prepared at Archipelago are melba toast with shredded foie gras and finished off with 24-carat gold leaf and Japanese plum in a jelly containing real gold flakes.

John McClements, chef and proprietor at McClements restaurant—located in London's outskirts in Twickenham—said he used gold leaf mainly on desserts such as petit fours or ice cream. He said he had used it for the past five to six years, not just for presentation, but for taste.

Alexander said higher quality gold had no taste, but McClements said it did, particularly when eaten with chocolate.

Some of London's more expensive bars are selling drinks such as vodka which contain specks of gold, Alexander said. He was trying to source champagne with gold flecks from South Africa.

Combats aging

Gold facials were introduced to the British capital last September, having launched first in India some 18 months ago, according to London-based beauty therapist Punka Yusupoff.

Yusupoff said the benefits of gold facial treatments were numerous, including very powerful anti-aging properties.

The therapy is based on Ayurveda—an ancient science founded on herbal and holistic healing.

"Gold helps to counteract the degenerative process caused by environmental pollution and the toxic build-up caused by mental stress," Yusupoff said.

The metal's qualities were used to rejuvenate and revitalize the skin, reverse oxidation damage to collagen and promote cell regeneration, she added.

Some skin specialists said they were skeptical about gold's beauty benefits.

"As far as scientific evidence goes, gold or any heavy metal cannot penetrate normal skin," Dr R.K. Pandhi, head of the skin department at New Delhi's All India Institute of Medical Sciences, told Reuters.

"Gold has no role in rejuvenation of the skin," he added.

Yusupoff said a gold facial, which lasts for an hour and costs about 40-50 pounds ($50), was better than normal facial treatments because of the metal's added properties.

It felt different, she said, because it did not clog up the skin, but let it breathe.

Pot of gold

Products—developed by the Delhi-based leading Indian skin care company Shahnaz Husain group—include a gold cream, gel and mask.

In addition to 24-carat gold leaf and gold dust, these Ayurvedic formulations include plants, herbs, roots, spices and minerals.

Yusupoff said the nicest product was the "pot of gold," resembling a foundation and used in conjunction with a moisturizer.

"It gives a beautiful finish to skin, a very subtle sheen. For evening wear it glistens."

Yusupoff said she did not see the treatment falling victim to the fickleness of fashion.

"Gold and everything Eastern has become very fashionable, but it will last."

"It's not faddish because it has therapeutic value. From a medicinal point of view alone it's a fact," she said.

Yusupoff added that diamond facial treatments were also under development, but was unsure when they would make it onto the market. Reuters

Can we ever have the nation we want? UP's best minds predict when and how

"The Philippines
Into the 21st Century"
By Jose V. Abueva
(General Editor), et al.
University of the Philippines Press

BY DANTE M. VELASCO

In one breath, with a palpable sense of despair, we ask: Can we ever get out of the mess our country is in? But, in another breath, proving that hope truly springs eternal from the Filipino heart, we earnestly seek an answer to the question: When can we have the nation we want?

Is finally having a better Philippines a simple matter of when, or a problematical matter of if?

Can we finally tear ourselves away from the vicious cycle of rising and falling expectations and from the seesaw between peace and conflict? Can we finally have choices beyond the unacceptable extremes of systematic authoritarianism, on one hand, and a bumbling democracy, on the other?

Can we have real economic prosperity that truly deals with the plight of the poor, and not a prosperity that makes the rich richer and the poor poorer? Can we ever get out of the predicament of a flawed free society, to paraphrase a former American president, that "cannot help the many who are poor, (and therefore) cannot save the few who are rich?" Can we be spared forever from a leader who promotes a class war—woeing the poor and wishing woes for the rich?

While abroad, when can we be spared from the bad news of banditry and economic plunder, and instead be treated to the good news of heroism and economic growth in our country—and so be touched by a sense of national pride?

Closer to the gut, we query: When can people go to bed without pangs of hunger? When can children have a life of fun and a secure future, and not a life of scavenging in the stench and squalor of a mountain-size garbage heap?

EXECUTIVE READ

When can farmers truly enjoy the fruits of their produce and fishermen get substantial earnings for their day's catch—enough for their daily bread and some extra to secure a future?

The authors of the book, "The Philippines Into the 21st Century," conclude—after exhaustive evaluation and rigorous analysis—that the Philippines is in for a full flowering of socio-cultural, economic and political institutions that will result in a brighter future for Filipinos by the year 2025 at the

At the concluding part of the 216-page book, they give this forecast:

"The chances look good for the consolidation of Filipino democracy. The nation's cumulative democratic experience, including the recent and phenomenal expansion and strengthening of citizens' organizations in civil society, helps in the rebuilding and institutionalization of democracy. Progress in economic and social development, if sustained, is conducive to democratic consolidation. The global democratic revolution provides it with a favorable external environment."

That's not a sound bite, I know. It's a mouthful. And yet it is the one passage that captures the message of the entire book, which is subtitled, "Future Scenarios for Governance, Democracy and Development, 1998-2025."

And, more important, it is a statement that concludes an exhaustive multidisciplinary study about a huge subject like the entire country and about the longest road ahead of us called the "future."

This is not your kind of book when you curl up in bed on a rainy day to get small doses of homespun wisdom or handy anecdotes. But this is a book that you must read, if you are in search for answers about the future of our country.

For so long, we have been treated to viewpoints and opinions dished out so casually and so recklessly—and we therefore take their opinions with a grain of salt.

This book changes all that.

The conclusions about where we as a nation are going and in what shape—plus in what possible dates—are arrived at by 50 scholars and experts—based on assiduous research, data, well-thought-out premises, rigorously analyzed viewpoints, objectively tested findings, and systematically arrived at scenarios.

We come away more confident that we have been given a roadmap for the future, and we are told that some of us are at the driver's seat—and we must do our job well.

Be patient as you wade through the robust, if not clinical—but occasionally inspired—language of scholars, of ten stripped to the bare essentials of communicating fact and truth—he cause, along the way, you will encounter interesting questions as: Shall we shift from a presidential to a parliamentary form of government? Is it true that among 39 countries evaluated for student achievement in science and mathematics, the Philippines ranks 37th? You will invariably get informed answers.

You will have to be prepared for a rare encounter with the collective thought of the experts—top-notch academicians or high-ranking government officials (past and present)—or both.

You may start with the integrative framework at the beginning to encourage yourself. Then jump to the concluding notes that are punctuated by tables that, at a glance, tell you in what year we can achieve the best for the Philippines in nationhood, democracy, rule of law, health, etc.

Then, make a reckoning that by 2019 or 2025, you would still be a ripe by then to savor the bright prospects.

In the same concluding notes, the authors reserve their best shot in the Long March, which focuses on the future leaders of the country, proposing five job qualifications—covering competence, respect for human dignity imbued with a vision, emphasis on character formation and commitment in preparing future leaders for orderly succession. Did our previous presidents qualify?

FAVILA and former Bank of America chair Dave Coulter

The string of jobs Favila held eventually led him to the banking industry, which would become his bread and butter.

In his senior year in college, Favila applied with the Merchants Banking Corp., that was looking for accounting clerks at the time. Since he was working for almost four years, he was immediately accepted.

He worked at the Ermita branch of the bank. He promptly left at 4:30 p.m. to catch his 5 p.m. class. This sounds impossible now but almost 30 years ago, there was no such thing as traffic.

Favila started out in the banking industry as the collector of local drafts or checks drawn from the provinces. It was the old clearing system. His route was Binondo, Azcurra (now Recto) and he took the jeep to do his routes. But he was provided with transportation allowance.

On to Citibank

He stayed with Merchants for about two years after graduation and then moved to Citibank as an international processing clerk in 1971. Favila relates that his banking career exposed him to all the facets of the banking industry, from loans and credit accounting, cash and commercial.

Merchants Bank paid him just P200 a month, while Citibank quadrupled it to P800 when he transferred.

Favila considers Merchants Bank owner Vincent Recto as his mentor. The list later expanded to include bankers Luis Manapet, the late Victor Medina, Jose Tizon, Aleson Cruz, Wellington Ty.

"Mr. Recto told me that banking is a business of trust and confidence. You should not break the covenant of the bank and the public," he stresses.

Favila made a name for himself in the bank through his hard work and determination that rival banks eventually noticed him. Metrobank owned by George Ty was the first to take notice, putting Favila in 1974.

At Metrobank, his final pay as an executive under the treasury department was P25,000 a month plus bonuses and profit share.

During the economic crisis of 1986, where there was a debt moratorium and therefore no Treasury activities, Favila took a two-month program in banking at the Wharton Business School.

When he returned, Boboy Virata recruited him to join the Exchange Capital Corp., a local partner of Jardine Fleming.

Up to CEO

But in just two years, in 1991, the new owners of Security Bank asked him to head the bank. He stayed until 1995 when BSP Governor Gabriel C. Singson, a relative, appointed him to head the former state-run Philippine National Bank.

When the new administration took over in 1998, he moved again and joined Aligned Bank in September 1998.

His colorful and rewarding career in the banking sector exposed Favila to all kinds of executives and clients who taught him everything about banking. He, however, says his father, a lawyer by profession, remains his greatest role model.

"He worked with the Rehabilitation Finance Corp. (now the Development of the Philippines) in Dagupan. He came home on weekends and I saw how hardworking he was," Favila recalls.

During vacations, they would go to Dagupan where the young Favila was exposed to the disciplinarian ways of his father and his grandfather, Dr. Manuel Singson-Favila.

"My grandparents would make it a point that we were disciplined. They made sure we did not waste time. We even worked in their ice plant," he says.

It was therefore a big blow to him when his father died in 1987. He was left to help take care of his siblings, being the third eldest child.

Favila is actually one half of a twin but his twin died shortly after birth.

He originally wanted to become a lawyer like his father but he found the course too long. Besides his early work experience led him to fulfill his destiny in banking, where he has the distinction of being the CEO of three of the country's biggest banks.

FAVILA winds after work.

Can we ever ...

Five presidents from Manuel L. Quezon to Fidel V. Ramos, Joseph Estrada's all-too-brief stint was not included in the study.

And yet this concluding paragraph might as well be a timely reminder for the current president and for future presidents:

"As history's good and effective leaders have shown the world, only a few of them were saints; they were simply humans who emulated the best and tried always to aim high, to learn, and to transcend themselves. For they truly cared for the people under their responsibility. No less will be expected of the Filipino political-administrative leader in the 21st century."

As for you, dear reader, if you care enough about whether we will ever get the nation we want, tap the rarely untapped critical mind in you, and be ready to discuss our common future with the best minds in this book. (dantenv@i-next.net)

Showbiz and cellphones make a 'hot' team

SHOWBIZ and cellphones may seem like an odd couple, but this "love team" is pretty hot and getting hotter these days, says the head of the Philippines' largest mobile phone company.

Entertainment content—what one author calls the "e-factor"—is helping cell phone companies build their business by keeping their customers busy clicking on their keypad to get the latest ring tones, logos and send answers to the quiz show that may win him a million bucks.

"There is a whole new generation of customers out there," said Napoleon L. Nazareno, Smart president and CEO, in a recent speech before the Rotary Club Makati West. "They are the generation that has a huge appetite for entertainment and their tribe is increasing."

To meet this demand, Smart has been launching a flurry of entertainment services. Some samples:

The successful Text to Millions contest where participants answer via text a variety of trivia questions. Those who correctly answer four questions in a day get to join a raffle with a P1-million top prize. A housewife from Tacloban won the first big draw on June 8, while a university student won last week's final draw.

Ring tones and logos are a big favorite. Smart also offers graphics from such sources as Sailor (featuring popular characters like Hello Kitty), Cartoon Network (Bugs Bunny and the Power Puff girls), Tamiya (with its popular anime characters) and the Philippine Basketball Association (which offers the logos of its member clubs).

In the Smart Movie Club, the subscribers who sign up can get movie info, download logos and ringtones, play interactive games and also win tickets to movie premieres like the hit movie "Tomb Raider" and "Jurassic Park Part III."

The rising popularity of entertainment services reflects how differently cell phones are used by young professionals, students and teenagers—who now make up the bulk of the cell phone market.

Unlike older folk who take a more utilitarian attitude, the young like to have fun with their phones. They delight in dressing up their phones with different logos, having ring tones of the latest hit songs and checking their daily horoscopes through their phones.

The games and contests, however, extend the appeal of cell phone-based entertainment services far beyond the ranks of the young. Nazareno relates. "While I was in the hospital recently, I overheard doctors and nurses debating the right answer to the question: 'What is the largest planet in the solar system?'"

What's happening here in the Philippines cellular business reflects global trends in telecoms in particular and business in general.

NTT DoCoMo of Japan, which runs the world's most successful mobile Internet service called i-mode, has found that its subscribers spend much of their time visiting chakumelo or "fluff" sites where they buy customized ring tones and graphics for phone displays. They also go for game sales.

But it's not just telecom. Entertainment is "invading" business worldwide. And business is becoming more and more entertainment-oriented.

Responding to growing consumer demand, more and more companies are "using entertainment content in order to entice the consumer into buying products and services and to enrich his experience when using these products," Nazareno adds.

He quotes media consultant Michael Wolf: "There is no business without show business."

In his 1999 bestseller "The Entertainment Economy: How Mega Media Forces are Transforming Our Lives," Wolf wrote that "consumers have come to expect that they will be entertained all the time. Products and brands that deliver on this expectation are succeeding."

Products that do not will disappear."

He cited McDonald's, which boosted its sales when it began distributing toys and unwittingly became the world's largest biggest toy distributor along the way. Wolf also pointed to Singapore Airlines that has invested heavily in a computerized entertainment system on board their aircraft that is even more powerful than the computer guiding the passenger plane.

For the telecom business, embracing entertainment content has been made vastly simpler.

BY TINA ARCEO-DUMLAO

AFTER months of anticipation, Jose L. Cuscia, chairman of the new business club group PhilamLife, is set to fulfill a promise made to many of the country's top business decision makers.

He is set to formally open the doors of the Tower Club, located at the 33rd and 34th floors of the PhilamLife Tower in Makati, to club members this week, making his vision of putting up a prestigious business club in the country a reality.

Cuscia's vision for the Tower Club is shared and supported by the venerable Washington Sycip, founder of the auditing giant SGV & Co.

These two business heavyweights are joined in the board of governors by other esteemed captains of Philippine commerce and industry like PLDT's Manny Pangilinan, Benpres Holdings' Oscar Lopez, Hyland Realty's Rafael Hachanova, Ambassador Ramon del Rosario Sr. and his son, former Finance Secretary and now managing partner of SGV Ramon "Boy Blue" del Rosario Jr., Pilipinas Shell's Oscar Reyes, Ayala sons Jaime Augusto and Fernando Zobel, fishing magnate Francisco Tiu-Lauri, former energy czar Geronimo Velasco Jr., McDonald's franchise owner George T. Yang and Ricardo Romulo and Roberto Romulo are also part of the board.

The voice of women in business is ably supplied by Corazon de la Paz, recently retired senior partner of Joaquin Cunanan & Co., and Doris Magaysay Ho, CEO of Magaysay Maritime Corp.

Danny Ignacio, part of the team that built PhilamLife Tower, collaborated with the prestigious CCA Holdings Ltd., represented by its chair Dieter Klostermann, managing director Helmut Knipp and seasoned Filipino hotelier Arthur Lopez to put the club into operation.

Architect William Coscolluela designed the building plans, while Robert Bilkey of Bilkey, Linas Design Associates based in Florida, USA, was commissioned to do the interiors.

CCA is an international management firm that operates some of the most prestigious private clubs and leisure facilities in Asia and Europe.

There will be two main dining outlets—a Chinese restaurant seating 144 guests, which will offer a menu of exotic and authentic Cantonese, Szechuan and other Asian cuisine, and a Western restaurant seating 132, which will boast of exquisite, multilevel continental specialties.

The Bar Lounge (capacity 53 persons) will have an excellent cellar with cognac, whiskey, brandy and wines, while the Cigar Room will provide members a venue to enjoy their Cuban cigars. In addition, there will be six private function rooms and a boardroom, which will be the ultimate in power meetings.

The Library, on the other hand, will carry popular titles. It is a haven for members who opt for a more sedate and quiet surrounding where they can read a book while enjoying their cappuccino. The adjacent Business Center will be equipped with up-to-date computers, laser printers and fax and copier machines.

Finally, the Tower Club has allocated a sizeable area for the fitness center, with separate sections for men and women. The center will house the latest in exercise equipment. There will be steam and massage rooms and a juice bar.

The Tower Club is developed and owned by the Philippine American Life and General Insurance Co. (PhilamLife), a member of the American International Group (AIG), the largest underwriter of commercial and industrial insurance in the United States.

Individual shares are going for P350,000 each while corporate clients have to shell out P600,000 for a share.

THE TOWER Club's health club has the latest in Cybex equipment for strength training and cardiovascular exercise machines such as treadmills built with personal television screens and heart sensors.

THE MEMBER'S lounge done in earth colors features a piano bar and a cigar room filled with top-of-the-line cigars from here and abroad.

standing of local investor sentiments.

"Perhaps, this explains why I quickly progressed to stock market trading and arbitrage for some clients," Tony says with excitement. He was the exclusive stock market advisor to two funds with total asset value of P2.4 billion. Despite bear market conditions, Tony still made a 100 percent return for the Meralco Foundation in '98. Thereafter, the prolonged crisis just made it harder to make any money for his clients.

The collapse of the local capital market has provided a different blessing for Tony, which he claims has enriched his perspective in life. He was forced to retire at the age of 40 from the industry given its problems but still has to collect retirement pay.

"It's a good thing I had made my money then and can use this time to enjoy Xavier and my wife. I was able to really focus on him for a change," Tony says.

Produced when he made his first million in the stock market, Tony can only venture that it was probably before he turned 35. Asked if that was in pesos, he laughs. "What can I do with a million pesos?"

"Seriously, I had wanted to get out of the investment banking industry since I got to a point that it was all consuming, personally and professionally. My health was suffering. The industry had to assume more risks just to survive, but the returns did not justify the growing systematic risks. Many of my good friends in the industry have to grind their teeth for now and pay it low key. But I was surprised that I could still do my financial packaging craft with P&A Ernst Young Manila without having to assume the transaction risks of an investment bank," he says.

Tony just started with Punongbayan & Araullo (Ernst & Young Manila) as principal (virtually a partner for non-CPAs) in charge of Corporate Finance (Corfin). He was surprised when the managing partner Ben Punongbayan called him and showed interest in his background. It was flattering since he had a lot of respect for the senior partners of the firm who had grown P&A from seven people to a 450-man outfit. He was also impressed that P&A has developed a very good name as an independent auditor and has kept very high standards. The firm moved into its new offices at 19th and 20th floors of the Enterprise Center, Tower 1 just two years ago.

Apparently, Corporate Finance is a growth area in Ernst & Young's Global Strategy. The group just bagged a major advisory engagement for Saudi Arabia's Tourism Commission and has major financial advisory engagements in various parts of the world. It has been very active worldwide on privatizations, project finance and capital markets.

EYI Law is equally growing as fast and is about the third largest in the world. As Tony explains, "If convergence is such a big word in IT, the same is true in the financial services and business assurance industries globally." It seems that one cannot focus only on traditional products such as audit and tax but provides other value added services that complement existing services. Corporate Finance, which used to be the singular domain of investment banks, is now offered by the Big Five.

"We are not out to compete with the investment banks. That is not why we are here. Our role is to augment their existing product lines and expertise so they can provide their clients with cost-efficient services. P&A Corfin's focus will be financial packaging and valuation, not syndication and distributions. Investment houses that have so far Corfin teams will not need our packaging services, but we can provide them with cost-efficient valuation services for their clients. However, there are investment houses that do not see the logic to having their own packaging capabilities."

With 50 local investment houses, having a Corfin team may prove to be too uneconomical. This is where we can lend more our packaging expertise to them—in M&A, financial restructuring, privatization, preferred shares or derivatives, for example. They can focus on what they may do best—distribution, syndication or underwriting. We can even tap EYI's global database for deal-specific information," he says.

P&A (Ernst & Young Manila) is an excellent "outsourcing" partner for Philippine corporations, which need to run more efficiently given the economic crisis. Companies are really better off just "outsourcing" their requirements instead of hiring expensive staff. In a sense, the role of Corfin is to support the CFO's functions, while Audit and Tax support both the CFO and Comptroller requirements. P&A even has a Business Services Group that provides payroll administration, which in turn supports the activities of an administration department of a company. "It is quite possible that in a few years, P&A Corfin will be providing virtual CFO services to SMEs that don't have a need for a full-time CFO," Tony says.

Where does Tony see himself five years from now? Tony is quick to answer, "You know, where I am five or 10 years from now doesn't really matter as much (looking at Xavier). It's where he will be that matters to me now."

100-YEAR PHILOSOPHY

Make something better and people will buy it

WHEN telegraphy teacher George Safford Parker introduced his pens to the world in 1888, his philosophy was "make something better and people will buy it." More than a century later, Parker has kept his promise and remains the consumers' brand of choice. This year, it is being honored with a SuperBrand Award by Reader's Digest Asia.

The SuperBrands Survey was launched in 1999 to find out the preferred brands of people from across Asia, based on a range of qualitative and quantitative values. Respondents from the Philippines, Hong Kong, Malaysia, Singapore, Taiwan and Thailand were asked to name the brands they admire, believe in and trust in a total of 38 categories from luxury products to everyday necessities.

Filipinos, the Reader's Digest Asia poll reveals, are big fans of the Parker pen—the brand topped the local survey making it a SuperBrand in the Philippine market. Filipino patrons troop to major retail outlets like National Bookstore and Shoemart Department Stores for their Parker fountain pens, roller balls, ball pens and pencils.

Parker is awarded the coveted Gold SuperBrand distinction for quality pens, having constantly produced writing instruments that enhance the pleasure of writing, combining style and traditional craftsmanship with advanced technology. According to the survey, Parker garnered performance rates significantly above other brands in the same category. To achieve SuperBrand status, a brand has to consistently deliver, based on a set of factors—quality, value, trustworthiness, image and satisfaction—and have top-of-mind awareness with consumers.

"To reach SuperBrand status in the eye of the consumer, the product has to consistently deliver on a range of qualities," said Peter Jeff frey, associate publisher Reader's Digest Asia.

"This survey reflects this outstanding brand performance for all those products listed. In effect, it is a seal of approval and a vote of confidence from the consumer, which is a tremendous recognition."

Commissioned by Reader's Digest Asia and conducted by research company Toy.or Nelson Sofres, the SuperBrand Awards is the only consumer survey of its kind and magnitude across Southeast Asia. Reader's Digest enjoys the highest audited circulation in the region and is recognized as the most widely read publication in Asia.

pler by the spread of digital technology. "Digital technology has uncoupled entertainment products from any specific medium and has made portable across multiple platforms," Nazareno says.

The movie "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon" for example, can be watched in a theater, VCR, DVD, cable or satellite TV. You can get information on the movie via the Internet and perhaps later on play a game based on the movie using your cellular phone.

For cellular companies, entertainment content has provided their subscribers another means to "personalize" their phones.

UPON entering Tony Herbosa's home in a plush Makati village, one gets the feeling that this man has indeed arrived. There is an oversized Sanso, walls with Mactan stones, Murano glass dividers and harra floors. There are also nude paintings in the den (done by Tony's New York-based artist niece Mia Ongpin-Herbosa), adorning a fully stacked bar and a lounge sofa—clear traces of swinging bachelor days gone by.

But one should spot the incongruity of it all: imported neo-classic furniture side by side with milk-stained strollers. Tony did not seem apologetic. "The mess could have been a lot worse if it was Xavier's lunch time," quipped the proud father.

For people who know Tony well, a former investment banker and man-about-town, raising a family at 40 has indeed changed him. He had a very active single life, married to his career, sports and his nightlife. It took a very different woman to slow him down.

"Lilibeth was so unique, having grown up in the provinces, and a breath of fresh air from the cosmopolitan types I dated," Tony remarks. "She was the extreme opposite of me, out Ying and Yang blended well. It also helped that I was an investment banker and trained to spot synergies," he explains with a smile.

Tony's career was fast-tracked since he got his MBA in Finance from the Wharton School in the 80s. After working briefly for Salomon Brothers, a Wall Street investment house, Tony went back to Manila to build his professional roots and hopefully find a wife and settle down. With so many eligible, well-heeled ladies, the latter objective became more muddled than he expected, so Tony just focused on his career.

He was fortunate to have gotten into investment banking while it was taking off in the early 90s and he credits his success to his early mentors. He learned much from his former bosses at Anseror (AB) Capital, but it was through his job as executive assistant to PCI Bank chair Eugenio Lopez Jr. that he learned the art of packaging and deal-making.

"Geny Lopez was not the classic entrepreneur from a Gokongwei or Henry Sy perspective. I remember that he even had a small oriental food store in California that did not break even. But he had the uncanny ability to triple the value of a project by simply packaging it properly and getting the critical components together at minimum risk. Perhaps, it was his vision, together with the uncanny sense of timing and people," Tony says.

Tony perhaps learned more than he bargained for. Polishing his craft, Tony packaged the financing of two Makati office towers totaling P1 billion prior to the crisis. He even brokered six floors to a bank and found a strategic partner. He has advised, structured and raised more than P15 billion in various transactions on behalf of his clients.

At the age of 33, he became a managing director for investment banking with a local firm. He raised P2 billion for the Metro Pacific Group and took the first shipping company public. The latter was one of his proudest deals, which he did with former Negros Governor Daniel "Bitoy" Lacson in 1996. Negros Navigation was worth P250 million, assets minus liabilities, when Tony came in to package its IPO. It was worth P3 billion after 12 months. The company was able to reflect and modernize its vessels.

Good investment bankers thrive in volatile, sometimes hostile environments, and you need to be analytical, a lateral thinker, with solid execution skills and attention to details. Without creativity, plain vanilla execution adds very little value to transaction. Unbridled creativity, without seasoned market judgment and execution, seldom gets a deal consummated to the client's advantage," he explains. What makes Tony's career unique is that he was able to package deals despite not having the infrastructure of a big bank or the distribution of a global investment house.

To be different from the bigger players, Tony had to rely on sheer packaging skills and a keen under-

OSTEOPOROSIS WAR ON A NATIONWIDE SCALE

Osteoporosis, which literally means "porous bones", is an enemy that strikes silently. It is the most common bone disease in the world and yet, sadly, there is no cure. Although treatments are available, the best line of defense is still through prevention. "Prevention through early detection" This has been the battle cry of Carnation Calcium Plus Operation Bone Check as it declared war against osteoporosis. Its mission - to provide free bone tests as a weapon to help combat the onslaught of this crippling disease. Operation Bone Check, which began in July 2000, initially provided service to residents of Metro Manila and nearby provinces of Luzon. But with the additional acquisition of state-of-the-art bone-scanning machines, it is now in full operation nationwide. Various teams have been assembled and dispatched to cover areas in the Visayas and Mindanao. Above, the Carnation Operation Bone Check does the rounds at Melvin Jones Park, Baguio City.

Enjoying Gabriel

BY CHELO BANAL-FORMOSO

LAST summer, I was asked to be the keynote speaker at a seminar on inclusive education that the UP College of Education conducted for parents, teachers, school administrators, Special Education students, therapists and other professionals involved with children with disabilities (CWD).

"Why you?" my daughter asked, in the tone teenagers usually use when a mother proposes or says something incredulous. "You're not a cabinet secretary. You're not a government official."

"I'm better," I said. "I'm a parent."

Doctors teach how to keep them 'away' from your child

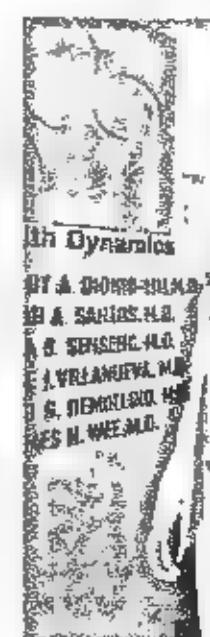

CARING for your child body and spirit—a holistic approach to health care.

BY CATHY BABAO GUBALLA

WAITING interminably in a pediatrician's office is every parent's nightmare. Most especially if the child is nursing a fever that seems to rise a centigrade every half-hour or so. Even more frustrating is, after waiting an hour or so, the consultation is rushed because there's a kilometric line of patients waiting for the doctor.

Blessed is the pediatrician who goes the extra mile to respond to a parent's multiple questions about his or her child's illness or, better yet, has the sensitivity and heart to go beyond the child's medical care. At Health Dynamics, a child health care company owned and managed by a group of young and progressive pediatricians, there are no people waiting in line as consultations are by appointment. Even better, the company holds parenting workshops aimed at promoting better and safer child care by developing informed and empowered parents.

Doctors Joy Diono-Lim, Mylab Santos, Eliza Senseng and Myrene Javier were all pediatric residents at Medical City in the early '90s when they began to ask themselves how they could improve their work in pediatrics. Early last year, they came up with the answer by pooling their resources to form Health Dynamics, a group practice that offers child care and parenting workshops on various infant and childhood concerns.

"Parents nowadays are of a different breed. They ask more questions, they are really involved—both mothers and fathers," Senseng says. "Parents expect more from their doctors now. If they feel shortchanged, they will leave you and move to another doctor," she adds.

Empowering parents

We asked the doctors if giving detailed explanations to parents or holding workshops took up more of their time. The answer was yes, but they were quick to add that there was much to gain. "Parent education will result in less frantic calls at night because parents know what to expect. It really is the call of the times. If you have an empowered parent, that parent will eventually make wise decisions for the child and, in the long run, that is what we are really aiming for," Senseng says.

Currently, the group offers five workshops on a monthly basis. These workshops were formulated through focus group discussions (FGDs), the doctors held with their patients' parents. "We tested the modules on them before we decided to open it to the public," Diono-Lim says. The workshops include lectures, film showings and actual demonstration. Babies 101, Preparing for Baby's Coming teaches the new parent or parent-to-be how he/she can help in the baby's development; the right way to hold, dress and bathe the baby, sudden infant death syndrome and baby's sleep, the best way to nourish and feed a baby, the danger signs to watch out for in a baby's first few weeks of life, and important decisions to make for the baby.

The workshop on Infant Massage teaches the parent the benefits of infant massage and the right techniques in doing a whole body infant massage. Another workshop on Child Safety Guarding against Child Abuse and Injuries teaches prevention of injuries in the home, school and the child's environment, guarding against kidnapping, signs of abuse in children; guarding against child abuse and rape; and dealing with child abuse problems in the family.

Learn from each other

Other workshops are on Childhood Emergencies and First Aid and How to Handle a Picky Eater. Diono-Lim says workshops often also become informal support groups among new parents. "Many times books and videos are inadequate so the parents who attend the workshops also learn from one another and they validate old practices. Many times the books they read are Western in orientation and so the workshops give [what they learn] a Filipino context," Diono-Lim stresses.

Workshops are held on Saturday afternoons and run from two to three hours depending on the subject. "Other doctors sometimes ask us why we do it. It's really more for the child rather than the parent because we know that the child depends so much on the decisions that his/her parents make," Senseng says. "The fulfillment comes in knowing that what you have taught will benefit the child. It always feels great to hear from parents that what we taught them worked."

For the doctors of Health Dynamics, the workshops have given a deeper dimension to pediatrics. "The practice has more depth since we started doing these workshops which helped us develop a deeper relationship with the parents," Diono-Lim adds. "It made us see our patients in a different light. You don't see just the sick child—you see the child within the context of the family that he or she comes from, and that spells a whole lot of difference," according to Diono-Lim.

Health Dynamics is at 1706 Medical Plaza Ortigas, Pasig City. Call 637-3029.

I have, in fact, been a hands-on parent since the day my son Gabriel was diagnosed with autism. Not that I wasn't hands-on before that; we lived in America, the land of milk and expensive child care so my husband and I had no choice but to raise our children on our own.

By "hands-on" I mean I have prompted or pushed Gabriel every small step of the way so he could, at the very least, learn to verbalize his needs.

I fought for Gabriel to be placed in a regular class in Sacramento and, when we came home, it took me a year to find the right regular school for him. The teachers at the Montessori Filipino Child Research Center in Loyola Heights welcomed Gabriel with open arms, but they did not know what or how to teach him in the beginning. It was clear to me they needed help. And so I went back to the University of the Philippines and took up Special Education (Specd).

When you're studying to be a teacher, you take education courses where you are required to stand in front of a class and give a report. This is to prepare you for the day when you have to stand and deliver. If you're majoring in sped, you are expected to do a report on the characteristics, behavioral deficiencies and excesses, medical problems and social shortcomings of persons with disabilities. In one class you learn about children, in another about teenagers and in still another, adults.

I sat in classrooms where I listened to reports or lectures on what autistic children are like, what they cannot do, what they do that is not appropriate—negative things mostly that if you were not a stout-hearted parent you'd give up the fight. In one class it was noted that parents of CWD grieved out of a sense of deep loss even though their autistic children were alive, and on another day, we were told siblings of CWD worried about how to tell their future in-laws about the disabled brother or sister.

As a parent, it bothered me that the students were getting the wrong impression that the situation was always dismal when the truth was that things got better as you learned to adjust and help your child. I longed for a course that would talk about positive things, like how to enjoy being with special children, how to value them for the immeasurable things that they can teach you and the joys that they can bring into your life.

And so when my chance came to talk before a group of people who had day-to-day exposure to children with disabilities, I made haste. That morning of my so-called keynote speech, I talked about enjoying Gabriel.

Favorite places

Whenever I can, I try to spend some stress-free time with Gabe. No demands, no expectations. An afternoon when we go where he wants to go and he does what he wants to do without me hurrying him up. I keep checking the impulse to lead him to a store where something attracts my eye or to stop him when he's communing with the floor pattern.

Most of the time we end up at his favorite places—National Bookstore, Power Books, the free library for children at Robinsons Galleria. He loves looking at books, smelling them, reading them, or just holding them. If that is being autistic, then I guess I must be one, too. There is nothing like the smell of a new book, and the feel of it in your hands. I've always gotten a high from opening a fresh book on page one and reading the very first line, and I've observed the same in my two hours.

Gabriel has a collection of Disney books and Disney videos. He's an authority on Walt Disney. He can name almost all the Walt Disney movies. He will tell you if it's a Disney Masterpiece, a Disney Classic, a Disney Sing-Along, etc. If there were a Disney Rip-off, he would know that, too, I'm sure. If he hears a piece of music, he can identify which Disney film it comes from.

In addition to Disney videos, he has an extensive collection of other videos. If he watches a movie once, he can tell you next time which production company was behind it. Was it Paramount, Touchstone, Warner Bros., Dreamworks, or Universal?

Now back to his fascination with Disney

We play games based on Disney fairy tales. I was in bed one time trying to get some sleep when he gave me a kiss. I kept my eyes closed.

"Sleeping Beauty didn't wake up, Dad," he said to his father.

"Well, are you the Prince?" asked Dad.

"Yes, I'm the Prince," he said.

Upon hearing that, I opened my eyes. "My Prince," I said with love in my eyes and voice.

Gabe smiled with the satisfaction of a prince who had just saved his princess. I closed my eyes again. He kissed me again. I opened my eyes.

"My Prince," I said again.

He shook his head and, trying to control his giggle, said, "I'm Samson, I'm the horse."

We all got a big kick out of that.

Lessons well learned

Like any kid, Gabe loves eating at the burger-and-fries places. I usually let him sit at a table where I can see him while buying our food at the counter.

There had been a few times when I'd carry our food to the table and I would notice the diners at the next table giggling and throwing furtive glances at my son.

"What did you do, Gabriel?" I would ask.

"No, don't tell her," he would say to the people at the next table, a worried look on his face. What would give him away would be the chewing.

It would turn out that he had picked some fries off the next table and started eating them. I'd apologize and the people would say it was no big deal, sounding sincere, but I still would go back to the counter and get another bag of fries for them.

I corrected this bad habit by telling Gabe that if he did it again, we would get out of McDonald's without eating. The next time we went into a McDonald's I reminded him about our deal and he couldn't resist the temptation so we got out of the place without eating. The next trip I reminded him again and this time, he didn't do it. I never had to remind him again—he had learned his lesson well.

One thing you can appreciate about persons with disabilities is their honesty, although Gabe can be brutal. I took him to a well-known pediatrician at Makati Med. This was our first visit because, despite his autism, Gabe is a healthy boy. He rarely gets sick, and when he does, it's usually just a cold. One time, the cold having turned into a bad cough, I took him to this doctor, a nice man about my age, which is young. He examined Gabe then led us to his desk. He was wearing the regulation white doctor's jacket. I noticed as he talked that he had unusually hairy arms. Now if I had noticed this, it was highly likely that Gabe did, too. I glanced at Gabe and caught him looking at the doctor's hands, then his arms.

"Doctor, you look like a monkey," he blurted out before I could kick his leg.

I was so embarrassed it took me a few minutes before I could start apologizing profusely. The doctor waved me away, "It's the body hair—it's perfectly all right."

It's dangerous to bump into a short adult person when you're with Gabe because he will not be able to contain himself. "Look, Mom, it's a dwarf!" He would say it out loud, too, and with genuine amusement at having just seen someone he had only read about in fairy tales. Well, one time we were at the mall and a group of midgets walked past us.

"Look, Mom," said Gabe excitedly, "it's the seven dwarfs."

Then he realized there weren't seven and corrected himself. "One, two, three, four—only four dwarfs."

"Good counting," I said.

We took my mother to the doctor one time and as we sat in the clinic waiting for her to come out of the consultation room, two nuns walked "The Singing Nuns!" exclaimed Gabe.

"That's right," they replied in unison with amusement.

Gabe smiled, looked at me and said, "Mom, they're the Singing Nuns." To them he said, "This is my mom."

Cinematic lines

It is hard to be solemn in church when Gabe is with you. "Look, Mom, it's Dolly Parton," he said pointing at a lady with big hair and big you-know-what. "It's Michael Jackson," he said another time, pointing at a lanky African American boy with gelled wavy hair that did look like Michael's.

Once a rather overweight young lady sat in the pew before ours. The extra fat was more obvious in her buttocks. Well, Gabe has always been too fast for me. He pinched her there. She looked back. First person she saw was my husband, and what else would she think? Both my husband and I said we were sorry for what our boy did, and we told Gabe to apologize. "Sorry," he said in his best behavior, and at that the girl smiled and turned away. "Sorry, chubby," added Gabe. More apologies from us.

Actually, that was a line from the Disney film "The Great Mouse Detective." But you have to hand it to Gabe that he has timing. His choice of movie lines moreover was uncanny.

I immediately opened the door.

"Mom," he said, "can you make me a woman?"

"What?"

"It's Daniel in 'Mrs. Doubtfire'. He said can you make me a woman."

He was referring to Robin Williams' movie where Williams had knocked on his gay brother's door and asked to be made into a woman so he could work as a nanny to his kids after the divorce. I told Gabe that it was not appropriate to say that.

He sure remembered that. He was in the shower the next day. I had to go to work so I told him to open the door so I could kiss him goodbye.

"Bye, Gabe," I said, giving him a peck.

"Mom, can you make me a man?"

I had told him it was not appropriate to say "can you make me a woman," and he thought it was the last word there that was the problem so he changed it to what applied to him. My boy had no inkling about the possible repercussions for a boy to say "make me a man" to a woman.

I took him to hair salon here for the first time and, of course, the hair expert was gay. My son took one look at him and asked, "Are you a man or a woman?" I waited for the answer. "I'm a man," said the guy with the scissors. Good answer, I think that's what Gabe suspected all along, that this was actually a man even though he had the ways of a woman.

Feelings

Upon our return here, we applied with the Bureau of Immigration so the kids would be recognized as Filipino citizens when they're in the country. There was a lot of paperwork involved so we made three trips to the bureau. On the third trip, the agency required three ID photos of each child. We took them to a Photo booth on the ground floor. My daughter went first. Then it was Gabe's turn. "Sit up straight, look at the mirror and smile. That's all you need to do, Gabe," his dad said

We heard three clicks and then we told Gabe to come out. In a few minutes, the booth clerk got the printouts and went to her counter to cut them up.

"Oh, no!" my daughter said, horrified.

"What? Why?" we asked.

When the clerk handed us the photos, she tried to keep from laughing. We looked at Gabe's photos. In one, he was sad, like crying. In another, he was a surprised boy. In the last one, he looked terrified.

When we finally submitted the forms with the photos, the immigration clerk only needed two copies. We got to keep the photo of a sad Gabriel and somewhere in Immigration today are photos of Gabe surprised and Gabe scared.

Whenever we recount that story, we all get a good laugh. And Gabe laughs with us. His teachers have always said he has a great sense of humor. He likes movies that are funny. That's why he's such a big fan of Robin Williams, Jim Carey, Billy Crystal, Eddie Murphy and Michael J. Fox.

He knows how to tease people.

"Nanay we're going back to Sacramento," he told his grandmother once. "No, no, no," my mom said, "Don't go." And she pretends to cry. Gabriel bursts into laughter.

"Don't cry, Nanay I won't go," he said.

The next Sunday when all my brothers and sisters and their children came to visit, he announced, "Hey, everybody, we're going back to Sacramento."

As if on cue, everybody whimpers and whines. "No, don't go, Gabe, stay." He loved that.

He must think we are the easiest parents to please, and that may be true. From the time he was diagnosed, we have learned to take delight in every small progress he makes—the colors he uses in his artwork, every new word he utters, every discovery that amazes him.

All these stories point to a thought process, something that psychologists said would be lacking in my son. Putting two and two together was going to be too difficult for him, they said. Applying one situation to another, or what we called generalization, would be almost impossible, they also said. Well, they're wrong. Gabe looked at the hair on the doctor's hands and thought of a monkey. I told him it wasn't right to ask me to make him a woman so he asked me to make him a man, which is what he's going to be one day soon.

He knows how to ask for information— are you a man or a woman?—and how to confirm his suspicions. He has more of a sense of humor than doctors and psychologists and all kinds of experts would expect of a boy with special needs.

"Children are adept at becoming what we expect them to be." I can't remember which grossly overpaid psycho-ogist said that but I have to agree. Gabriel is our Exhibit A.

If love could cure him, he would have been cured by now. But he needs more than that. I think we made the right decision placing him in a regular classroom where he has felt at home.

At his Montessori school, it's no big deal that he sometimes talks to himself. He has moved with his classmates from grade to grade, and now he's in second year high school. He's doing the work at his level, which is somewhere between fourth grade and nirvana.

Maybe Gabriel is not learning about chromosomes or tembic pentameters but he is picking up a lot about friendship, about getting along, about having fun, about coping, about life. If these kids can give one another the gift of laughter, that's good enough for me. I'll take that anytime.

The week of July 16 to July 22 is National Disability Prevention Week.

LIGHT is excellent for enhancing the mood. The right kind of light can lend a soft, gentle character to any room. So why not illuminate your favorite section of the house by making your own perforated paper lampshade in whatever design you fancy?

This handcrafted lampshade also gives a very romantic accent to wherever you decide to put it. "Perforating the paper base creates a glowing effect. Perforated lamps allow the hobbyist to make his own designs," says Ester Gallardo-Tolentino of Craft World (tel. 634-5882). With Craft World owner Zeny Perez, Tolentino regularly gives different craft workshops at Robinsons Galleria.

CRAFT

Easy-to-follow

Basic tools and materials for making perforated paper lampshade include white or colored cardboard (P25), double adhesive tape or Scotch tape (P40) and prism paper available at any leading book store and craft shops. The prism gives the glow to the lampshade.

You can use needles, pins or any sharp, pointed object to prick the paper. But if you are planning to make this a serious endeavor, you can buy a specialized pricking tool at Craft World in Robinsons Galleria for P150. You will also need a pricking pad made of rubber. Otherwise, you can use a pile of newspapers or any thick cardboard box as pricking pad.

You can get designs from coloring books, magazines, wall papers or gift wrappers. Designs may vary depending on the occasion — hearts for Valentine's Day, lanterns or angels for Christmas or cartoon characters for birthdays. If you find a design you like, have it photo copied (reduced or enlarged) and attach it to the cardboard.

Lamp bases and light bulbs are available from your neighborhood hardware stores for P100-200.

But if you want to go to just one place for all the materials you need, you can go to Craft World for the perforated paper lamp kit.

IO lobby leads to a world of music and fun.

BY CONSTANTINO C. TEJERO

YOU don't have to be a star on Broadway to get a standing ovation. Or hold a concert to get an SRO crowd. Here, you're always in the spotlight!"

Nothing flatters one's vanity or massages one's ego better than those lines from a flyer of a karaoke-television club, particularly if one is a Madonna or Lee Salonga wannabe.

When Trebel president Roberto del Rosario invented the sing-a-long system in the late 1970s, he intended to use it for his music school. At the very least, it was meant to be a home and family affair; that is, it should be confined to one's living room. No one foresaw the practice of "microphone-singing" would go public.

Then the Japanese picked up the Filipino invention and popularized it as the karaoke ("to sing without accompaniment"). And soon almost every gathering had a one-man band, also known as the minus-one player.

KTV bars started sprouting all over the place like, well, shiitake mushrooms. The most popular in Makati in the mid-'90s was the 21-room Music Plaza 21 on Jupiter Street, which is still as popular as ever.

Some social observers believed it was just a trend that would soon go the way of the hot pan de sal. And, indeed, many such bars closed down after a few months of operation. A well-known example was Canary, which has since given way to Hard Rock Café at the Glorietta.

Songs and laughter

One that has stood its ground since it opened in 1998 is IO Family KTV, located on the third and fourth floors of Jupiter Place Building, Jupiter Street, Makati City (tel. 895-5940 to 41).

After three years, the place is still going strong, says its general manager Edwin Reyes in fact, despite the national crises last year, both political and economic, business reached a peak.

These days, Reyes adds, occupancy of the club's 70 rooms is 85 percent on weekdays and 120-150 percent on weekends (mostly families and barkadas). The place is open 5 p.m. to 4 a.m. on weekdays, and until 3 a.m. on Sunday.

Rooms vary from small to medium, large to VIP Charge for a room for 4-6 persons is P360 per hour, while a VIP room for 35 is P2,400. Rates are slightly higher on Friday. Special group rates are offered Sunday-Tuesday all night long, or 5 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Each room has a state-of-the-art computerized song selection program. The barkada, the sweethearts, the parents, the grannies, the kiddies can have their fill of song and laughter here. And they can even dance.

Over 18,000 songs are offered, from the baduy to the techno, from the tender to the rambunctious, in English, Japanese, Spanish, Tagalog, even in the regional languages and dialects. We just haven't discovered if they carry Eminem.

Circular arrangement

The name was taken from Io, one of Jupiter's moons. Reyes explains it was because during its planning stage in 1997 there was a trend toward cosmic or planetary motifs in society and the media.

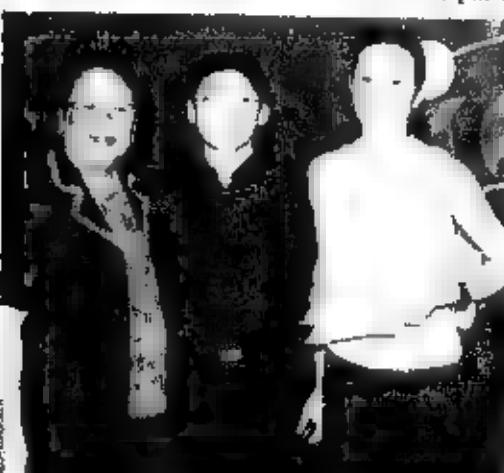

The sleek interior was done by award-winning Hong Kong-based interior designer Joseph Sy. The color scheme carries nine hues, with red for the lobby, blue and mint for the third floor, and three sections of the fourth floor done in yellow, orange and pink.

The arrangement of the rooms is circular, almost labyrinthine. "That's to maximize space, as they do in Hong Kong," Reyes says.

So, if you feel you've inhaled one bottle too many, you better memorize your room number or color before going out to the comfort room. Otherwise, when you return, you'll get addled and go in circles, as in a maze.

The door has a clear-crystal panel from top to bottom, though, so you can look through and see if ACCOMPLISHMENTS are overshadowed by the harsh realities and palpable miseries that surround people's lives.

ITS foundations may be enough to spark hope and keep its flame burning

Exhibit shows land ownership does not end farmers' woes

A COLLECTION of moving color photographs, "Uma: Photographs of Rural Communities," will be moving from the Penguin Cafe Gallery in Malate to the PRRM Gallery in Quezon City tomorrow, where it will be on display until July 21.

REAPS Foundation tapped a group of photographers to document selected agrarian reform communities—its people, their lives, their work and their culture to enhance the consciousness and participation of the public in rural development.

Inspired by the US Farm Security Administration's deployment of photographers in the 1930s to document rural America in aid of policy reforms, REAPS, a non-governmental organization, commissioned photographers Mike Alquinto, Raymond Panaligan, Gt. Narte and Nco Sepa.

The photographers tried to represent the agrarian reform communities' visions and dreams. "Farming villages turned into centers of sustainable economic activity and growth, generating development that will radiate among neighboring communities."

The exhibit text, in explaining the show, says, "Land is the pillar that props up the farmer's dream of a good life. This dream has spanned generations, has spawned intense struggles for equity, and has generated a number of possible solutions that eventually receded into oblivion."

The photographs show that "sometimes deliveries of services seem to be short of expectations, and accomplishments are overshadowed by the harsh realities and palpable miseries that surround people's lives. Dilapidated shacks, weather-beaten and sad faces, hunched backs, calloused hands and feet, and worn-out clothes show that the good life remains a dream for the Filipino farmer."

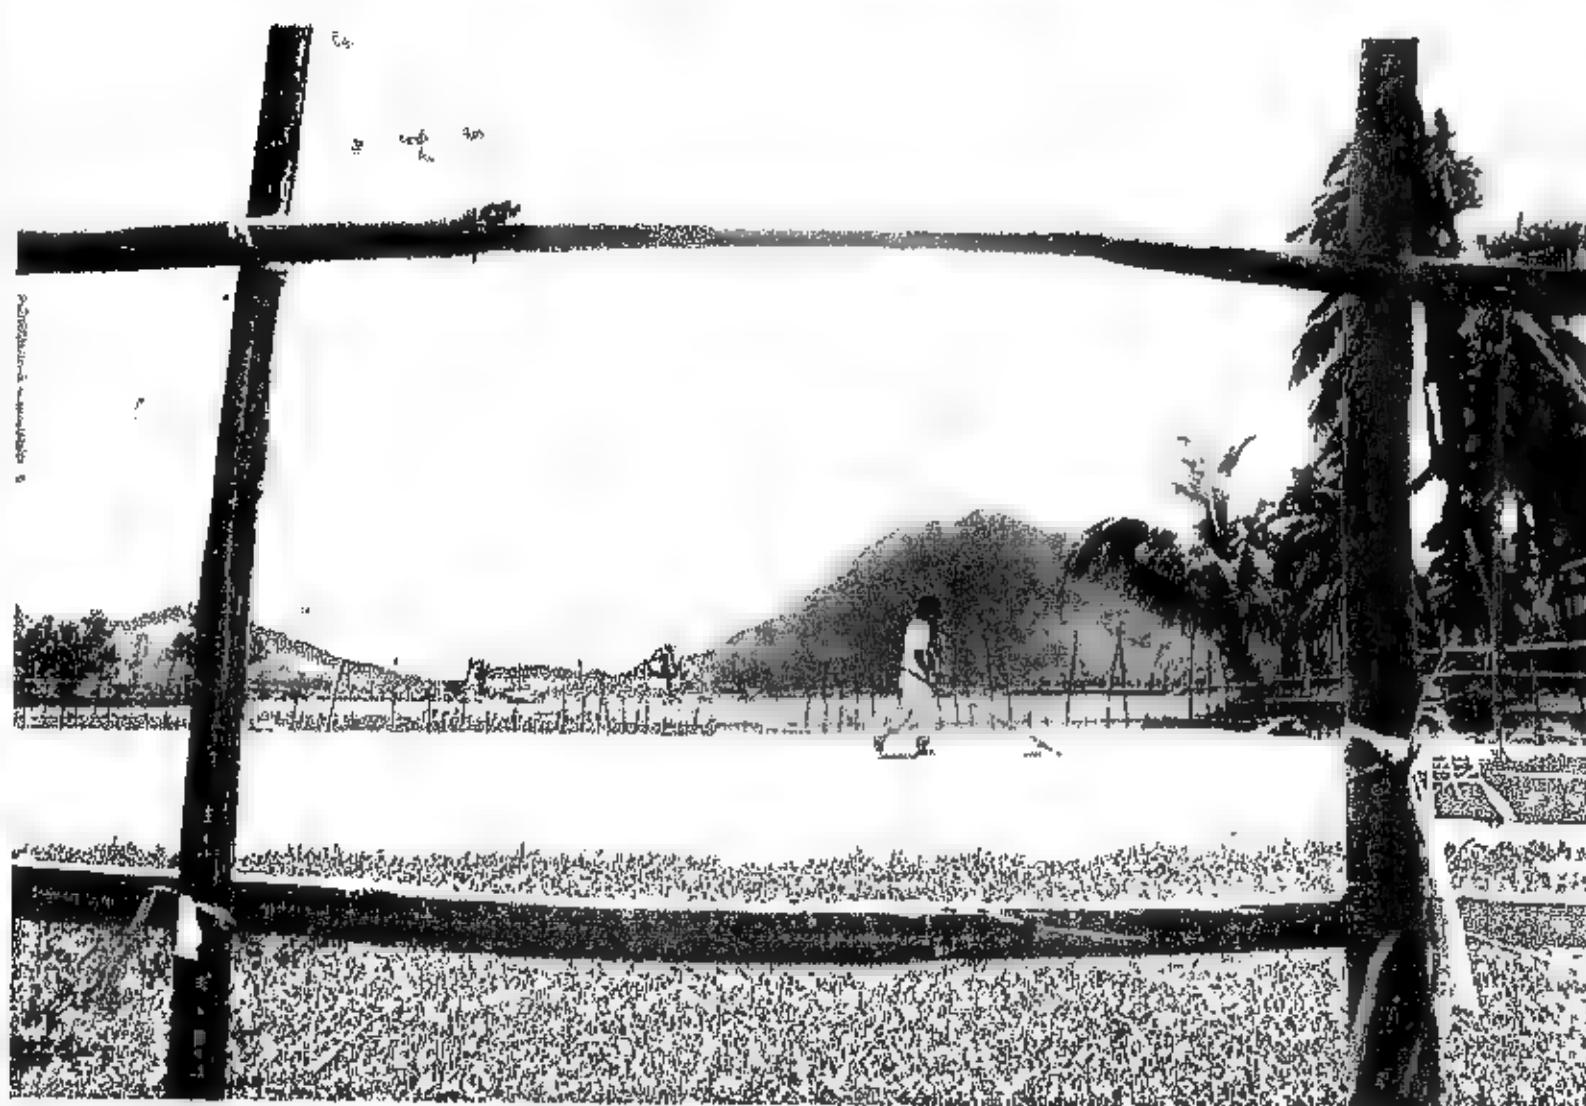

The present generation and the next may not see this dream fulfilled, but they see its foundations being laid in the ARCs. That may be enough to spark hope and keep its flame burning."

From the PRRM Gallery, the exhibit will move to UP Los Baños, July 23-29, and to Blind Tiger Sports Bar in Quezon City, Oct. 20-Nov. 16.

Call REAPS at 411 6000.

Is using an antiseptic cream really necessary?

The answer is, yes. Because it helps heal your child's wound twice faster than applying nothing at all.

Q What's in an antiseptic cream that makes it effective in making the healing process faster?

A An antiseptic cream, like Band-Aid® Brand Antiseptic Cream, contains clinically-proven antibacterial agents like cetrimide and chlorhexidine gluconate, which effectively kill germs that cause infection. Its cream base also helps provide a moisturizing environment necessary for the faster healing of your child's wounds.

Q Is it only recommended for deep wounds?

A No. Also for minor wounds, which your active children usually get. Always remember that scratches, scrapes, abrasions, burns, insect bites and skin rashes could also get infected when treated improperly.

Q Can it also help relieve pain and swelling?

A Yes, it can help. Some antiseptic cream brands available in the market, like Band-Aid® Brand Antiseptic Cream, have special moisturizing formula, which cools and soothes the discomfort associated with the wound.

Q Does it cause irritation when applied on the wound?

A No. It contains no alcohol, so it does not sting nor cause any irritating feeling. It can also be absorbed by the wound quickly and effectively because it is water-based.

That also explains why it gives a cool, refreshing feeling when applied.

Q What is the best way of applying antiseptic cream?

A First, you have to clean the wound with soap and water. Next, disinfect the wound's surrounding area with cotton and isopropyl alcohol. Then, apply a small amount of antiseptic cream on the wound. Lastly, cover the affected area with a plastic strip.

Ballet Center hosts a well-attended golden jubilee celebration

CEBU is celebrating the golden jubilee of Ballet Center with activities stretched over a six-month period. All have been planned with precision by Fe Sala Villarica, who in 1951 opened the only studio dedicated to classical dance south of Manila. The first studio was in Gorordo Avenue, and the next one, too, further up the road. Then it went to Lydia Ibañez's St. Benedict's School, and now it is at the Ayala Center.

"Fifty years!" Fe exclaims, adding that they have passed rather quickly, and more so if you just dance, dance, dance. But Fe does much more than that. She teaches, firmly, and she inspires, powerfully. Ballet Center has produced some excellent ballerinas and three outstanding male dancers: Nicholas Pacaña, who became a star with the Boston and Atlanta Ballets; Noordin Jumalon, the principal of the Cultural Center of the Philippines' Ballet Philippines, and Benjie Diola, who not only performs but mounts successful choreographies in Guam.

The Ballet Center golden jubilee celebration started with an alumni homecoming in June at the home of the Villarica family in Beverly Hills, Cebu City. Shortly after Nicholas Pacaña arrived with Gregory Aaron, his codirector of the Festival Ballet, both conducted seminar workshops pretty much as they do for the 65 ballet students they have in Atlanta.

Since April, when rehearsals started, anticipation has mounted for the grand anniversary ball to launch the jubilee at the Cebu Plaza Hotel. A formal event, it saw the presence of Cebu's best families and a large segment of the attendance had at one time or another been part of Ballet Center, be it as a student, a volunteer, or a participant in some ballet scene that required ordinary mortals.

Fe was radiant, seated beside Herme Villarica, most dapper in a dark suit, and with them were Vicente and Emma Luzada (nee Sanchez, and one of Fe's most accomplished ballet students). Dinner was served buffet style and while people were having dessert, Monette Alifio went up to announce a brief commemorative program. As slides of old photos were featured on a screen, Ballet Center's alumni came up to share treasured memories.

The '50s were reminisced about by Ingrid Sala Santamaria, the '60s by Mary Faehnrich Abad, the '70s by Nicholas Pacaña, the '80s by Mary Poblete Chan, and the last decades by Fe and Herme's three lovely daughters, all of whom appeared at one time or another on the ballet stage—Gia Villarica Suarez, Karen Villarica Reina and Maia Villarica Franco.

The slides were put away and Fe came up on stage to thank one and all for the support for the past 50 years, and before she ended she intimated that the best was yet to come. The current crop of dancers at Ballet Center plus an excellent sprinkling of students from the University of San Carlos did musical numbers from Broadway hits "Annie" and "Evita," which brought the house down.

As the strains of a dramatic Strauss waltz were heard through the sound system, out came 14 pairs to dance a waltz especially choreographed by Fe for this occasion. There was a swirl of silks and satins, the sparkle of heirloom jewels and the joie de vivre, which a festive occasion as this can bring about. Leading them all was Ingrid Sala Santamaria, and guess who was her partner?

Chona Sala Montinola danced with Noordin Jumalon; Teresing Mendezona, who had done the ballroom's décor, with Alex Diola; Annabelle Lu Ym with Gregory Aaron, UK Honorary Consul Moya Jackson with Dr. Guillermo Blanco; Mary Abad with Junjo Ferreros; Marinda Tan with Ben Yapjoco; Adelaida Javier with Pat Acabodillo; Alma Reyes with Warfe Engracia; Bebot Ramas with Bill Neri.

It was all in the family for couples Cely and Eddie Chiongbian, Melba and Ed Limbaco; Mariter Dumon Klepp who danced with her son Andy; and Maxwell Espina who escorted his lovely sister Filma Perez Espina.

The waltz was followed by a "Petit Polka," danced by another set of Ballet Center alumni. Among the girls were the Villarica sisters Maia, Karen and Gia, Joy Onozawa, Debbie Lianchin, Ana Dimauao, Iris Ng, Marisse Dunque, Guadalu Samson, Karen Woolbright, Mary Chan, Tina Mangueira, Johanna Mangubat, Lorraine Dyuan, Mary Rose Manghuyop and Carmel Sanchez Cabaero who assists Fe in running Ballet Center and with the executive committee of the jubilee.

Among the guys: Ryan Vasquez, Roger Corsiga, Juan Jimao-as, Frederick Jax Montelibano, Benjie Diola, Nino Michael Baring, Dr. Mario Chan, Doy Radaza, Christopher Santos, Paul Gotiang, Warren Tan, Wilcoy Jbanes and Alfonso Mosqueda.

That formally opened the ball, and with so many dancers present it went on and on. The "Kiss of Fire" tango was played and there went Pat Acabodillo to ask Fe Villarica to take the spotlight. Frederick Abellana, a doctor of medicine by profession but was once a premier dancer of Ballet Center, went across the room to ask Angie Daque to cut a mean figure with him. It could have gone on forever.

Next morning there was Fe at the studio rehearsing for the next event. It takes place this weekend with the Queen City Chamber Ballet performing in "Ang Pagbabalik." That is the Cebuano term for "Homecoming," referring to Nicholas Pacaña's visit. He has announced this will be his farewell, but he can always stage a "comeback." And the term "ang pagbabalik" may still apply.

For the rest of the year, Ballet Center has a national photo and painting contest with the theme "Dance is Life," with awards to be given in August, and in September, there will be outreach lectures, demonstrations and film showings in Cebu schools as well as entertainment areas of Ayala Center and SM City Cebu. A "Choreographer's Showcase" is scheduled for Oct. 20 at Ayala Center's Theater for the Performing Arts, with participants from all over the Visayas.

A glittering highlight is the "Pas de Deux Spectacular" scheduled for Nov. 9 and 10, also at Ayala Center. The best soloists from the country's best ballet companies—Ballet Manila, Ballet Philippines and Philippe Ballet Theater—will perform gems from the classics like "Don Quixote," "Le Corsaire," "Sleeping Beauty," "Romance," "Romeo and Juliet," etc. And then comes a full production of "The Nutcracker" on Nov. 30 and Dec. 1. All of these will keep Cebu's balletomanes literally on their toes.

A one-touch room service has been incorporated in the computer system. The place has 70 employees, smartly dressed in a uniform designed by Rajo Laurel (black basic, with color-coding in green, yellow, red and blue according to service).

The real competition
There are only two family K-TV clubs in this part of Makati, so competition is not so stiff. The real competition comes from nearby P Burgos Street, where there are eight K-TV bars with GROs (not for the family, obviously).

Wedding caps romance across the Pacific

BY DONNIE C. RAMIREZ

DISTANCE makes the heart grow fonder. The sentiment may be trite but it was certainly true for Matthew Lloren and Tani Aragon. Their long-distance romance crossed the Pacific, and resulted in a beautiful wedding at the Manila Metropolitan Cathedral in Intramuros.

Matthew, eldest of two sons of Oscar and Evelyn Lloren, was born and raised in the United States. In 1999, after completing his law studies at Bristol University in Bristol, England, he came to Manila to visit with relatives. He met Tani at the office of her boss, his cousin Gina Quintanar-Campos, Northwest TI GM. He fell head over heels in love the moment he laid eyes on her. "I knew even then that I wanted to spend the rest of my life with her," he says now.

Their growing affection was momentarily interrupted when Matthew flew back to the States to take up his masters in international legal studies at the American University in Washington, D.C. But the distance was not a barrier to the romance. The young couple burned the wires and nearly caused their respective PCs to crash with endless e-mail.

Two years later and with a master's degree, Matthew returned to the Philippines and formally proposed to Tani. Their wedding was a charming event officiated by Msgr. Don Erfe and Rev. Dr. Greg Ramos.

Tani, daughter of Pedrito and Ma. Teresa Aragon, and a communication arts graduate of the Ateneo de Manila University, wore an exquisite silver-gray gown with Swarovski crystals designed by Mila de Leon. Matthew was every inch the dashing groom in a fully embroidered barong Tagalog.

Complementing the good looks of the couple was the youthful entourage composed mostly of their barkada.

Matthew's brother, Terence, was best man and Tani's sister, Patricia Ann, was maid of honor. The bride's best friend at Northwest-TI, Candy Ochoa, was matron of honor. Groomsmen were Jomar Castillo, Mark Espelita, the groom's schoolmate Warren Howlett and his cousins Manolet and Dominic Lloren. Bridesmaids were Marica Cabrera, Maryrose Centenera, Ginggay Joven, Tet Magno and Bebe Timbo.

Secondary sponsors were Tonton Aragon and Vivien Hilario-Aragon for the candle, Toti Aragon and Ana Esperanza Uy for the veil, and Eugene Buenaventura and Peachy Nazareno for the cord. The junior attendants were C.J. Aquino (ring bearer), Gerard Reyes (co-n), Vincent Aquino (Bible), Alexis Torroba and Renee and Eunice Errmita (flower girls).

Principal male sponsors were Leon Ang, Antonio Bejar, former Shell Philippines president Cesar Buenaventura, Ramon Mojica, SGV chair Cesar Purisima, Joe Laia, Camilo Tabora and the bride's favorite uncle, Eddie Torroba. Women sponsors were Amparo Aspiras, Matt's aunts Eufrasia Nisce, lawyer Luisa Quintanar and Dr. Milagros Torres, WEDDING/p.E6

Wine sampling

Wine is taking a prominent role in weddings and celebrations. Some attribute it to the highly publicized health benefits particularly from red wines; others point to the evolving sophistication of the Filipino palate, especially among the young. With the proliferation of wine imported into the Philippines, it has afforded consumers the chance of tasting a multitude of wines of every type and description from different countries. Liking what they tasted, they gradually develop a preference for wines in general.

"Any kind of wine will do as long as it's of good quality. And it does not have to be expensive. For beginners in terms of wine drinking, I recommend wines with only 6 percent alcohol content so as not to affect your system and something soft, smooth, pleasant and easy to understand," says connoisseur Luciano Zanotto of Silver Secrets Inc.

He will hold an invitational wine sampling at 5:30-7 p.m. on July 18 and 25 and Aug. 8 and another one, which will be open to the public, on Aug. 1.

Music consultancy

In any wedding, music provides the ambiance and the mood. And nowadays, Bernie Pasamba says, most couples deviate from the usual wedding repertoire and prefer movie themes, heavy classics and opera music.

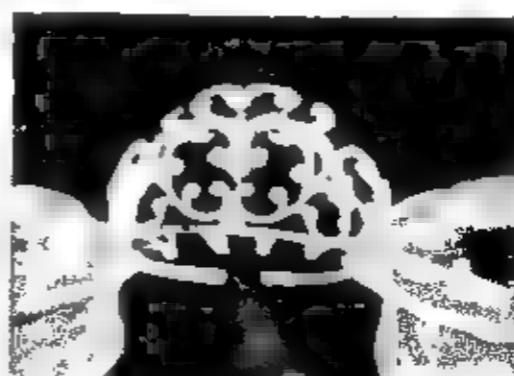

"But every type of music can be turned into a good arrangement even if it's not appropriate to the ceremony or even if I don't like the piece," says Pasamba, who heads the Bernie Pasamba String Ensemble which has performed with local and international artists and done a thousand weddings.

Educational process

The Wedding and Home Show also serves as an educational process for couples for they don't just plan their wedding day but the kind of life they want to lead. After they get married, they'll need things for their house which they have to turn into a home. Everything that is featured in the show marks every great moment in their life. The series of seminars will brief couples on how to maximize the use of appliances and how to take care of them. The cooking demo, on the other hand, will fully engage the senses of couples," says Robbie Decena, marketing vice president of Automatic Centre.

All the activities will be held free of charge at Automatic Centre and BLIMS showroom in Makati. For details and schedule of activities, call 750-0314 and 750-8988.

She longs for her ex-boyfriend who's engaged to her friend

DEAR Joe,

Taz, an officemate, was my boyfriend some years back. I was so in love with him when we were still together. I still am.

Our relationship lasted for only two years. Up to now I don't really know what went wrong. Taz suddenly became cold and distant until he finally left me. The pain was unbearable. He could have just told me he was seeing someone new. It would have been easier to let go. I wanted to resign from my job but I couldn't bear the thought of not seeing him.

Taz wanted us to remain friends, but I refused because it wasn't what I wanted. I never talked to him after what happened. I pretended to be brave.

I became close to Julia, also an officemate. I told her everything that transpired between me and Taz, how much I loved him and the pain he caused me.

Then Julia became close to Taz, who courted her. I was not surprised for I had noticed the looks Taz had been giving her, that same look he would give me when he was courting me. Julia said she valued our friendship, but she also confessed her feelings for Taz had grown. She wanted to give him a chance, but she needed to have my blessing first. Though it hurt me, I gave my consent.

Julia and I are still friends, but we're not that close anymore. She and Taz have been together for more than three years now. To hide the pain, I got involved in wrong relationships. I'm still in love with Taz but he's now happy with Julia.

LINDA

There are still many among us who wallow in self-pity, longing for things we used to have but we can only dream of now. Taz belongs to Julia and you would be better off focusing your attention on yourself and how you could learn from all this.

It seems that you have learned wrong. You have allowed the venom of envy to creep into your system. Now you're nowhere near your oasis because you have been poisoned by unreturned love and affection.

A part of you is still with Taz. You will never learn to speak the language of true love if you would stubbornly cry out for a man who no longer loves you.

There are times when we envy people who find their happiness when we should be happy for them. Times when it is revenge that motivates us instead—the genuine desire to improve our lives. Julia, don't be miserable because your friends are happy. Be happy for them and let go of any emotional baggage that will keep you from making a head start on a new journey in life.

Start walking now and don't look back. Take away the envy, hatred and pity in your heart because somewhere on your journey, you will find your own happiness and your love will be given back by the person destined to share life with you.

He's separated and two women are in love with him

DEAR Tita Dulce,

I'm 28 years old. I got married when I was only 22. The marriage lasted only 1½ years. My wife and I parted ways and haven't communicated since.

Two years ago, I had a relationship with a girl I fell madly in love with. She accepted the fact that I was married but separated and was willing to wait until I got an annulment. We had a romantic relationship and my love for her grew. Then, when I was ready to ask her to live with me, she broke up with me because her parents were opposed to our relationship. It hurt, but I respected her decision and let her go.

After a few months, I entered into another relationship. I knew I was unfair to the girl because my heart still beat for my past girlfriend. But this girl knew about my past and she accepted me for what I am. And, to our surprise, her parents accepted me when she told them about us. We planned to live together after a year with the blessings of her parents.

A few weeks ago, however, my ex-girlfriend called and wanted to revive our relationship. I told her about the new girl and our plan to live together. She was disappointed, but she keeps sending me sweet text messages. She said she wants me back. Should I stick to my girlfriend, or should I go back to the girl I still love but whose family would not accept me?

I haven't filed for an annulment, but I plan to do so soon. Will it be a problem if I were already living in with someone by the time I file for an annulment?

of her parents, or if compared to her painful realization that no matter how great the love you profess for her, you are still not truly hers?

I think the best course for you, hijo, is to stop creating further complications in your life and in the lives of those who love you. Therefore, do not rush back to your ex-girlfriend. Stay with your present girlfriend but, as gently as you can, call off your plan to live together, and you and she should stay away from the bed.

Your first priority, hijo, is to get a marriage annulment. See a lawyer about it now. Find out the financial and legal requirements, that way you can plan the petition better. After that annulment, you'll see that it is much easier to love and be loved.

Conforming to the law of God, the Church and our country

JUSTICE is an extremely important element in our lives. We have lots of rules and we ought to be just and good. The dictionary says that "just" is an adjective which means righteousness. Therefore "just" is legally right and certainly conforming to the law of our country, the law of the Church, the need of others and the will of God. Justice, therefore, is a noun which means the maintenance or administration of that which is just. Justice, therefore, is righteousness in our lives.

Justice to God

Justice is also justice to God and not just in our obedience. The Catechism of the Catholic Church says justice is the constant and firm desire and will to give what is due to God and to our neighbors. This tells us that justice is really love. Justice consists in loving God with all our heart and mind and strength, and loving our neighbors as ourselves. There is a nice song in one of the radio stations that says: "Heaven is waiting here to help us in our lives and in all that we need to be holy. That is the justice of God."

Justice is love

It is certainly true that justice is also love. Justice in our lives certainly consists of loving God with all our mind and heart and actions, and loving our neighbors like that and just as we love ourselves. We must be just with ourselves and also with God and others. St. Augustine also sees the link between justice and love. He says: "The first stirring of love is the birth of justice. A better love is very good justice. Perfect love is clearly perfect justice." The Pope, John Paul II also told us that "Christ left us the commandment of love of God and of all our brothers and sisters in justice." This commandment covers all that concerns justice as well as love." These are good thoughts of St. Augustine and Pope John Paul about what justice should be!

MUSTARD SEED

Joseph Galdon, S.J.

Sources of justice

The Psalms are also a good list of the justice of the Lord. They are hymns in praise of God, thanksgiving of the love of God and petitions that will make us holy. The Psalms are also public worship and spiritual value. They are all very good thoughts. The details of the justice of the Lord are also revealed to us in the teachings of Jesus and the Holy Spirit. God gave us the details of justice in the 10 commandments: "I am your God and you shall have no God except me. You shall not utter the names of other Gods. You must keep holy the Sabbath Day. You must go to Mass. You must also honor your father and your mother. You shall not kill. You shall not commit adultery. You shall not steal and you shall not bear false witness against your neighbors. You shall not covet your neighbors' house and you shall not covet your neighbors' wife or possessions."

Prayer for justice

There are many good prayers for our justice of God. Some of them say: "Dearest Lord, teach me to be just of You. I want to go where You lead me in justice and I will hold Your people in my love." So every day, dear Lord, I pray that I will be just, that I will know You more clearly, love You more dearly and follow You more nearly. Dearest Lord, teach me to be generous in justice. Teach me to give in justice and not to count the cost of it. I want to be just to You, Oh Lord, and do Your will. Oh Lord, help me to be generous in justice of You. Alleluia! Alleluia for justice!"

Educated wedding choices

BY ROWENA C. BURGOS

IN TODAY'S changing society and environment, many couples are caught in the dilemma of whether to observe traditional wedding customs or jump into the modern era of getting married the simpler way.

So to help brides and grooms make the important decisions for their wedding day, Automatic Centre and BLIMS is presenting The Wedding and Home Show. Ongoing until Aug. 11 at the Automatic Centre and BLIMS showroom at 6797 Ayala Ave., corner Herrera St., Makati, it will feature informative seminars and sessions on prenuptial agreements, bridal fashion, feng shui, interior design, creative cooking for two, beauty and makeovers for brides, wedding planning and features the latest appliances and furniture and exhibits on wedding preparation trends.

With proper planning, one's wedding day will be romantic, exciting and memorable. The first step is to give yourself enough time.

According to Gigi Bautista of Gigi Bautista & Associates which is co-organizing The Wedding and Home Show, even if your wedding is small and less formal, one should still allow a lead time of six months at the very least. "Remember that you'll have your entire life to enjoy being married to each other so start it right. Take your time and enjoy all the pre-wedding parties, the shopping, the activities, the planning and excitement before that special day."

And to start it right, future brides and grooms can have one-on-one feng shui sessions with Joseph Chau until July 18, 10 a.m.-1 p.m. and 4-7 p.m. You can consult the primary figure of Chinese geomancy about anything for free—from the best day to get married to how to decorate your dream house.

Gigi Bautista will handle Wedding Planning 101 on July 21 and 28 and Aug. 4, 2-3 p.m. The Bridal Fashion Consultation with Pepsi Herrera and Edwin Tan will be held on July 18-20, 24-27

TRAVEL

ROGELIO SANCHEZ, BAGUIO

YOU open the doors of the duplex and behold the poetry of sea and mountains.

By JONI FELICIANO

IN MAY I received this text message: "C'mon! jst hop on dat plane and get on d 3PM flight!"

It was sent to me by my dear friend, Mike Ayala, who was inviting me to his family's beautiful island retreat, and who was aware that I had just lost my grandmother and was trying my best to deal with the pain. I've saved that message to remind me that escape is just a text away when I'm ready.

Mike—a businessman and son of the Davao-based industrialist Chito Ayala and his wife Fe Ayala—and I are kindred souls, sharing a love for the sea, scuba diving and music, among other things. So, despite the attack two days earlier on the Barcelo Pearl Farm Beach Resort and the dire warnings about the Abu Sayyaf, true to my nature, I went.

The "garden isle" of Buenavista—a vision surrounded by the whitest sand—is 45 minutes away from Davao City by motorboat. Upon landing you are met by smiling attendants in strong-type pantaloons who welcome you with exquisite necklaces hand-made from indigenous materials. You instantly feel that you have just come home.

As you enter the paradise, you will notice the trellises with bougainvillea that lead you to the main building that looks like a pavilion or a family sala. Facing the ocean, it is an architectural masterpiece of massive logs and wood planks roofed by intricate, woven cogon. The furniture, so comfortable, is done in wood and white canvas, with bulky cushions. You realize all the roofs in the island are made from the same woven cogon grass sheets.

There are shady trees, flowers and plants everywhere. Birds chirp from the trees, and surprise of surprises, peacocks (originally a gift of one pair and now numbering 14) stroll on the Bermuda grass (growing where it was once a white sand, thanks to Mike's mother Fe, whose green thumb is legendary in Davao).

I was led to the family villa, which opens in several directions for a full view of the sea. It was designed to be comfortable, with three air-conditioned bedrooms plus two hot and cold baths. Some meters away, immediately facing the sea, is a duplex composed of two suites, each with air-conditioning and the most attractive outdoor garden baths equipped with hot and cold water.

I thought how wonderful it was to be surrounded by all this foliage even in the bath, where plants and vines "drip" from the sides of the walls and the ceiling! It was hard to choose, but I decided to stay in the family villa to be with my two young nephews and nieces who, along with their parents, came with me.

For those who want something different, something more exposed to the healthy sea air, there are three other beautiful "outdoor rooms" with their own baths.

The architectural design of these beach huts was inspired by Mike's trips to Bali. Each allows one to sit lie there, stare at the ocean, and marvel at the vista for as long as one wants.

Moveable feasts

In the middle of the island, hidden by a cluster of trees with drooping branches, is a swimming pool filled with fresh water especially brought in on a barge from the springs of Mt. Apo, Davao's highest peak.

There is a staff composed of two chefs and three waiters who constantly feed us, so that I had to tell them to take it easy on the food that would appear on trays wherever we were.

Interestingly, every meal was set up in a different location, maximizing the wonderful ambience of this island—under shady trees with the blue ocean in view during the day, and on the beach at night, complete with torches. It led us to look forward to each dining occasion.

The staff took pains to make every guest feel happy and at home, and we were served hand and foot wherever we found ourselves.

The island is truly comparable to the best private retreats in the world. It is so private that when you and your party are there, there is literally no other guest present.

The Ayalas purchased the tiny island in 1987. Time was when the family spent each Holy Week there with friends and other guests. The stations of the cross were placed on the surrounding trees, making the ritual all the more meaningful during Lent.

The dynamic combination of Mike's parents—a visionary father and an artistic mother whose contribution to the cut flower and orchid industry in Davao is no secret—made the transformation of the island almost complete.

Four hectares during high tide, its size is perfect; not too big and not too small, enough for one to be able to circle it in an hour or so, depending on one's pace.

The family aptly named it Buenavista, which is Spanish for "good view."

Marine sanctuary

The Ayalas have always had one of the best but unobtrusive security forces in the area. With the constant patrols, the family has been able to protect the marine life from poachers and dynamite fishing for years. Now, the waters surrounding the island have been declared a marine sanctuary.

Not doubting, yet not daring to believe, I slowly discovered the marvels found underwater. What we saw there was truly breathtaking.

We were well cared for by the island's operations manager, Lester Salinas, who doubled up as my dive master. Reminiscent of the character portrayed by the young Robert Shaw in "Jaws," he educated my companions on the temper of the water currents surrounding the island and the different marine creatures before we went to snorkel or scuba dive.

Mostly, his tips were on what and what not to touch.

Big or small fish, long or short, flat or round, striped or spotted, Lester knew them all!

PRETTY peacock strolls past a beach hut.

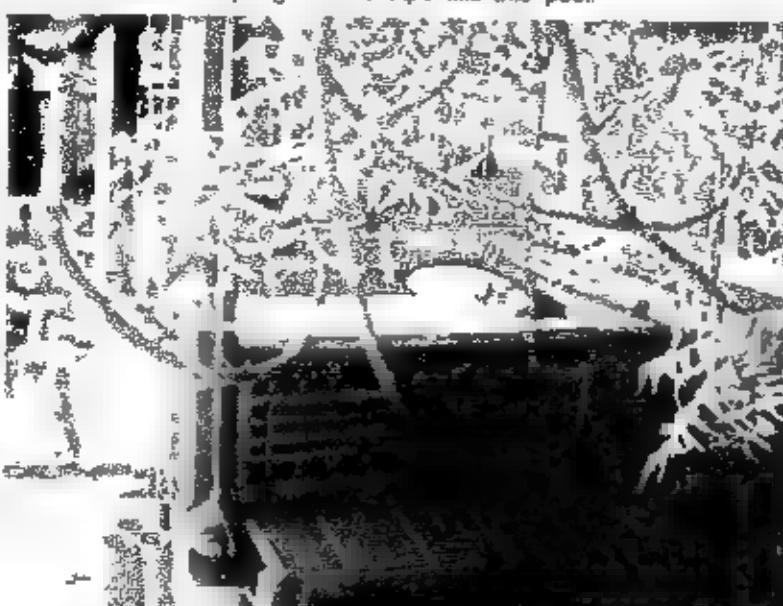

At certain times of the day at the other end of the island, you can observe the eels just dancing with the currents. And no matter how deep these colorful creatures were, you could see them because the waters were so clean and clear you could see as far as 15 feet below.

In the afternoons we were invited to simply dig in the sand for small clams. After a good rinse, they were ready to be prepared and cooked in a tasty soup for dinner.

At night the family gathered Maglites and scoured the shore for hermit crabs and other small crabs. I learned, quite reluctantly, from Lester how to grab a crab in a certain way so it wouldn't pinch me, to the cheers of my little niece and nephews. (I felt that all I had to do to complete the kids' amusement was to get chased by a barracuda while they cheered!) Of course, with my luck, I found myself beside one. Good thing it was a baby barracuda. Whew!

A small new crustacean I got introduced to was

TRAVEL BRIEFS

Total entertainment*

QANTAS recently unveiled its new $300-million "total entertainment" in-flight system which will be installed progressively in the airline's international fleet of 747-400s.

The project is due for completion next year.

Denis Adams, Qantas executive general manager for marketing, said the system featured individual video screens in economy class, larger screens with touch control in business and first class, and in-seat personal telephones in all classes.

"We will have two telephones mounted in the rear of each cabin for those wanting more privacy, and we are also introducing in-seat PC power in first and business class," Adams said.

He said this was the first upgrade of the airline's 747-400 fleet since Qantas introduced the first-class sleeper bed, the electronic Dreamtime business-class seat and the new slim-line economy class seat in 1998.

To remind everyone, Nobu refers to non-fabulous. I've already given out two awards earlier this year—one to the non-Deeda Blair white trash in our midst and the other to that Charmin deprivation senators who voted not to open the envelope and everyone else around them—Filipinos are forgiving. While I think it is a wonderful trait, this does not serve us well. I think we should make sure that these people and anybody who consorts with them or does anything with them should be treated like social pariahs. Think of the good people of La Vista and how they have been able to make those cited above feel unwanted in their own village. They are the mud on your shoes and should be treated as such. Don't talk to them, I, for one, am tearing up Lol's number. Then again, the only number I had of her was the one in Malacañang and we all know she doesn't live there anymore. 4. Our court system—in general, the best money can buy. How about the Appeals Court ruling on the Jose Go case? What can I say? Nobus love each other. What do they think we are? Supur! The glowing exception to this, of course, is Chief Justice Davide—bless him. For what we should do, please refer to No. 3 above. It holds for them, too. 5. Lopez companies—I refer to Maynilad, Bayantel, Meralco, SkyCable, ABS-CBN and Rockwell. Why should we suffer for the Lopez family's insistence on taking on loads of debt? Why should Maynilad users pay higher rates than Manila Water users? Why should Bayantel subscribers who request disconnect be charged disconnect-on fees? Why is SkyCable forever out of service? (I pay my bills, thank you very much—so if it's not that) Why is the picture on SkyCable so grainy? Why does Meralco send out a disconnection notice five days after the bill? Why do Rockwell owners have to pay so many fees? How many monsters has ABS-CBN created (a certain irritating female newscaster with a fixation on hairspray comes to mind here). Get the picture?

So you've read about the Queen Amidalas* for the first half of the year. While there is a lot of Nobu around, one must be truly Nobu to be tagged Queen Amida of the Nobu.

FASCINATED BY ASIN

May I congratulate you for the very nice issue last June 3, 2001? My special thanks and praise for the article "Salt of the Earth," a write-up on the group Asin. As a parish priest of Buenavista, Agusan from 1961 till 1964 and again from 1979 till 1985, I knew Pendong Aban as a little boy and saw him grow up. So I've always been fascinated by the group Asin. Their songs lived in my heart and still do.

Would it be too much to ask how I could contact Pendong Aban and how I could get a copy of their comeback album? If possible I would like to have their songs on CD. Many thanks for your kindness.

(You can contact Pendong Aban and Asin through their record company, Vicor Records, at tel. no. 721-8706.)

DEAR JANICE

I do not know you personally, but I literally grew up with you as I grew up in Manila watching "Flordeluna." Now I am a wife and a mother of a newborn boy. You are a woman who loves unselfishly and unconditionally, and because of that and your love for your family and kids, you are always willing to put yourself last. You give despite the hurt, and you realize at some point in time that you get exhausted because people keep on taking. It is nice to know that no matter how hard it was for you to give up something so important, you did. Because now you have learned to love yourself. That is what matters—not the pressure of thinking you failed somehow, or you did not meet people's expectations of you. It is your life, and it takes more courage to get out of a bad relationship than to stay in a miserable one. You are in my prayers. God bless you!

CHILD STARS

I really enjoyed your article on child superstars (SIM, 17 June 2001). They truly serve as an inspiration to the youth. I just wish you could have also featured Lea Salonga. I believe hers is an exceptional story to draw inspiration from.

The child stars featured are also role models since, while they grew up in front of the camera admired by the public, they were not only pretty faces but had exceptional talents, and were able to prioritize their studies. Hope to see Lea in your future issues. Thanks.

OOPS!

Erratum: No, we're not playing with our fonts again to make the magazine harder to read, dear readers. Due to a technical glitch, however, the font which appeared in the text of our stories last issue (8 July 2001) was the wrong one. Rest assured that we've eliminated the problem (he's dead now — KIDDING!) and are back to our old font this issue. Thanks for your understanding, and we hope you didn't get headaches.

Whose 'Anak' Is It, Anyway?

LAST MONTH, FANS OF PINOY FOLK ICON FREDDIE AGUILAR WERE STUNNED BY THE NEWS THAT THE SINGER HAD BEEN ARRESTED IN HIS OWN HOME, TAKEN INTO POLICE CUSTODY, BOOKED AND SUBSEQUENTLY RELEASED ON A P6,000 BAIL.

The reason: a criminal suit brought against Aguilar by his music publisher for "infringement of copyright." Three years earlier, Aguilar granted Star Cinema the license to use his signature song "Anak" for the film of the same title starring Claudine Barretto and Vilma Santos. This is in violation of Republic Act 8293, the Intellectual Property Code of the Philippines, maintains plaintiff Bayanihan Music Philippines, Inc. (BAMI); they own the copyright to the song.

Many were shocked to learn that the song Aguilar is most identified with may not, in fact, be his. How could anyone else own "Anak"? As a struggling young folk singer in Olongapo in the mid-'70s, Aguilar was already performing the simple but indelible tale of a prodigal son's regret, set to a haunting minor key melody that etched itself into your memory once you heard it.

"Anak" was a prize winner at the Metropop Festival in 1978, and won Aguilar a recording contract with Vicor Records the same year. The song was a record-breaking instant smash, not only in the Philippines but in countries as diverse as Japan, Holland and the US. "Anak's" theme and melody held a universal resonance, it seems, and by some counts it has been recorded in as many as a hundred versions in 23 languages throughout the world. In 1983, Billboard magazine — the music business bible — reported that "Anak" had sold six million copies worldwide. This was, to say the least, unprecedented for a Filipino artist.

Freddie Aguilar wrote "Anak," but "Anak" made Freddie Aguilar. Now he is embroiled in a custody battle that promises to be as heated and as emotional as any child custody case. As of this writing, the case is being heard by the Quezon City Regional Trial Court.

"I am the author of 'Anak,'" says Freddie Aguilar. "I am 'Anak.' Buhay ko 'yon (that song is my life)."

It is a slow night at Ka Freddie's Music Restaurant along a lonely stretch of Marcos Highway, and it takes a while to register that the female folk singer warming up the crowd — such as it is — is singing Dylan. "Don't stink wise, it's all right." Her diction leaves something to be desired, but Ka Freddie has a soft spot for struggling self-accompanied singers, even if no one listens to folk music anymore except graying, middle-aged beer drinkers nostalgic for the old days at the Red Cow or the Kola House or the Bodega. He himself was only 16 years old when he left home, dropping out of school against his parents' wishes, to pursue the uncertain life of a musician. It was during those difficult years as a starving folk singer, when he was wondering if his parents were right after all, that he penned the nakedly autobiographical lyrics of "Anak." In the song, the prodigal son regrets his own stubbornness, and wishes he had listened to his parents. In real life, however, "Anak's" success vindicated Aguilar's decision.

"Anak" was the biggest song ever produced by a Filipino record company," he continues. "Ang masakit doon, lahat ng gumamit ng 'Anak' yumaman na — except for the author. I was so busy promoting the album overseas that I didn't have any live concerts here. Wala tuloy akong kita. Pero nagbunga naman. Sumikat ng husto ang Tagalog version (I didn't earn anything. But it paid off. The song's Tagalog version took off)."

In March 1978, according to the practice prevailing in the recording industry at the time, Aguilar signed a standard contract with BAMI — the publishing arm of Vicor Records — under which, for the sum of one (1) peso, he assigned the rights to "Anak" and nine other songs to the publishing company.

This was the same type of contract signed by many popular composers of the day, including Rey Valera, George Canseco and Levi Celerio. Most artists enter into agreements with publishing companies for one reason: so someone can monitor the usage of their compositions and collect the royalties due. A 50-50 split of all monies between artist and publisher was not uncommon. Nor is it uncommon for the publisher to transfer the copyright to the compositions in their name. The common reason given is so they can spare the artist the tedious chores of collecting royalties and litigation, should the need arise. Most artists prefer to concentrate on their art, and leave the business details to managers. As a result, a significant number of Filipino artists don't own their own songs.

He was young and naïve and in a hurry to make it as an artist when he signed with Vicor and BAMI, he recalls.

"Inaamin ko na wala akong alam noon," he confesses. "All I remember is (then Vicor Records head honcho) Vic del Rosario telling me: 'Sa akin ka sumana, patatabuin kita ng pera (You stick with me and you'll be making big money). I didn't even know that there was a difference between the recording contract and the publishing contract. Alam ko lang, eto na ang break ko."

Aguilar obtained a copyright registration for "Anak" at the National Library, which is the government agency assigned to take care of copyrights, in April of 1978. But in August the same year, BAMI also obtained a copyright registration for "Anak" on the basis of the contract.

Intoxicated with the fame, if not the fortune, Aguilar says he neglected to pay close attention to the details of his relationship with BAMI.

Under the terms of the contract, Aguilar as the author and BAMI as publisher would split 50-50 any income derived from the sale of the rights, including "mechanical rights, electrical transcription and reproducing rights, motion picture synchronization and television rights, and all other rights" pertaining to "Anak" and the other songs listed.

Like most recording artists, however, Aguilar has no way of keeping track of how many copies his records sell, specially overseas. He has no way of knowing how many versions of his songs have been recorded by other artists in other countries, and how many copies their records sell. He is dependent on the sales reports and royalty statements submitted quarterly by BAMI, but he says he can never be sure if the figures are accurate.

"In 1983 Billboard reported that 'Anak' had sold six million copies worldwide, but I only got a gold record and a platinum award. I never received any international royalties until the 1990s, when I joined the Performing Rights Society of London. In 1992, I got about P300,000 in one quarter. How much more should it have been 10 years earlier, when 'Anak' was No. 1 in Japan and Germany?"

"Anak" is not his only composition that should be scrutinized, adds Aguilar. In the same album as "Anak" was a song called "Buhay Nga Naman ng Tao." A few years after it came out, American country singer Lee Greenwood recorded an English version of it called "Think About The Good Times." Subsequently Greenwood won the Grammy for best country artist, and sold millions of copies of the album including Aguilar's composition.

"Kahit singko wala akong nakita sa kanta na 'yon (I didn't get even five centavos for that song)," rues Aguilar. The same is true for the better-known hit "Magdalena," whose ownership is being claimed by Ivory Records, a sister company of Vicor Records and BAMI.

Eventually, Aguilar formed Aguilar Music Productions, his own record company. But his greatest (and most lucrative) hits remain in the catalog of BAMI. Nevertheless, based on a working arrangement with the publisher, Aguilar says he has been exercising his option to sell the rights to "Anak" since 1983, honoring the agreement to split the proceeds 50-50 with BAMI. After the February 1986 revolt, Vicor Records and its subsidiaries were sequestered by the government as a crony corporation. It was eventually bought by its present owners. But while it was under the PCGG's receivership, says Aguilar, he used "Anak" freely without a peep from the publishers.

In 1997, Aguilar gave Sen. Ramon Magsaysay Jr. the right to use "Anak" as the basis for a campaign jingle, for a nominal fee of P50,000. This prompted BAMI to file a civil case of copyright infringement against the senator and Aguilar. Magsaysay eventually settled out of court, but the case against Aguilar is still pending. In the current criminal case, Star Cinema also opted to settle out of court with BAMI, rather than face a TRO that might have scuttled the movie's premiere and delayed its showing.

Aguilar is not totally alone in his current legal battle, however. Representing him is lawyer Rod Domingo Jr., best known as counsel for the human rights victims of the Marcos regime. And while BAMI, upon the advice of its lawyers, declined to comment on the case, Domingo is more forthcoming. He says this is as much a rights issue as his more famous case.

"I maintain that Freddie Aguilar is the owner of 'Anak,' and thus cannot be deprived of his rights," he says. Domingo is no stranger to copyright law, having done legal work in the past for FILSCAP, the local composers' society.

"I do this work pro bono because I believe in the cause of the composers and I want to help them," he adds. "Talagang naaapi sila. Most of them cannot even engage the services of a lawyer. Ang kalaban nila, mayayaman (They are really abused. Their adversaries are rich people)."

There are many other composers facing similar legal battles, he says, among them such well-known artists as Mike Hanopol, Yoyoy Villame and Charo Unite. But in Aguilar's case, Domingo believes he is on firm legal ground. He summarizes his arguments thus: the publishing contract is null and void, and BAMI therefore has no basis for claiming the copyright for "Anak." If there is an aggrieved party in this suit it is none other than Freddie Aguilar himself, because he has yet to receive his full due.

No artist in his right mind would sign over his creations for one peso, adds Domingo. Most of the artists who signed these contracts understood them to be arrangements for the collection of due earnings, not absolute deeds of sale.

Be that as it may, it is now up to the courts to decide. The sad thing about it is that music – one of the most uplifting of the arts – is here reduced to its basest level: a commodity. In many ways, it is a case of "Where's my f-ing money?"

The irony of his current situation is not lost on Freddie Aguilar.

"There are hundreds of people infringing on copyrights in Quiapo everyday, and they cannot do anything about it," he says, referring to the brisk sales of pirate CDs in Manila – including "Freddie Aguilar's Greatest Hits."

"Instead they chose to file a suit against the author of 'Anak.'"

Still, he welcomes the lawsuit as an opportunity to reclaim his creation, and perhaps set a precedent for other composers in the same predicament.

"I want to get 'Anak' the right way," he says. "I want the courts to affirm that I really own it."

The Luxury of Doing Good

The need to do what comes naturally

EPHESIANS 3:20

If you had a billion US dollars, and you could easily afford a Rolls Royce car, you still wouldn't really need one. But if you're the showy type (though not all Rolls Royce owners are showy), you'd certainly think you have to own one. Definition: A luxury is something you don't need but can't do without.

Doing good, however, is a luxury we all need and simply can't do without! Think about this: "He that does good to another man does also good to himself; not only in the consequence, but in the very act of doing it. The consciousness of well-doing is an ample reward" SENECA (C. 4 B.C.-A.D. 65).

Drivers know that giving way to a fellow driver, the observance of simple road courtesies, pumps up good feelings from within — for both giver and receiver! Johann Richter said, "Do not wait for extraordinary circumstances to do good. Try to use ordinary situations.") From another ancient sage: "The good man is his own friend" SOPHOCLES (C. 496-406 B.C.) . . . as he (being good) is a friend to others. Truth endures through the ages.

Webster's New Dictionary of Synonyms describes a good person as one who is known to have such appealing qualities as kindness, generosity, helpfulness, and deep sympathy.

The Good Book, as the Bible is known (and our manual of operations for goodness' sake), conveys some basic principles: Goodness includes generosity that shares with those in need (see ROMANS 12:13; EPHESIANS 4:28b). It cares about others in a practical way, sharing both material and spiritual blessings without boasting or seeking thanks. Barnabas is an example (Acts 11:24). How about "Do for others what you would like them to do for you" (Matthew 7:12). And "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Matthew 19:19).

Exemplary goodness, anyone? Two true stories —

Remember Leo Durocher's pronouncement, "Nice guys finish last"? It happened in 1992 in the marathon tandem kayak racing event at the world championships in Copenhagen. Danish paddlers were leading when their rudder was damaged in a portage. British paddlers, who were in second place, stopped to help the Danes fix it. The Danes went on to defeat the British by one second in an event that lasted nearly three hours. But there's a happy ending to this story, too. According to The Wall Street Journal, the British kayakers won what many people regard as the highest honor in sports. They became the winner of the Pierre de Coubertin International Fair Play Trophy. The trophy is named after the founder of the modern Olympic Games, and it has been awarded annually for the past 28 years to people in sports who have demonstrated nobility of spirit.

Right here at home recently, a janitress at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport comes across an envelope containing US$10,000 cash. She returns this to its Indian owner, who doesn't even bother to say thank you. Asked why she didn't just keep it for herself, she simply replies that it isn't hers. A few days later she receives a reward of P10,000 from an admiring, visibly touched private citizen, with an open invitation to work in Hong Kong or Singapore. As of this writing, she says she's still thinking about her working abroad.

"Both rarities," you might say. But I'd say it's doing what comes naturally — because that's the very stuff man is made of. Christians who know their Bible will agree that man is made in the image and likeness of God. And this includes goodness, one of God's communicable attributes.

The Imago Dei in our system establishes and reinforces our nature to do good. To do otherwise is to go against our nature. In fact, tension and stress choke us in our anger, in our selfish, self-centered, intolerant, impatient, inconsiderate, generally hurtful ways — often leading to illnesses like heart trouble. And strained relationships. Even destroyed lives. Indeed, going against our nature is self-destructive.

When we give, love, and serve with our whole being — even to the point of self-sacrifice — a feeling of well-being sets in; doing good is known by medical science to produce good health. Doing what comes naturally (the Imago Dei principle, with God's power working in us) nurtures and is evidence of mental, emotional and spiritual well-being. Because doing good greatly reduces a lot of stress in daily living.

However, doing good per se is not good enough. Motives: Is it for currying favor, expecting something in return (like a commercial transaction).

hidden agendas, something to boast about? Shades of shallow goodness. "We always love what is good or what we think is good; it is in our judgment of what is good that we can make mistakes" JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU. Unless . . .

Christian author Eugenia Price describes the foundation of man's deep down goodness: "Good will toward all men is a result of the invasion of the supernatural! A state of good intention with 'heartiness and cheerful consent' toward all mankind, if Webster is correct. A state of heart so extraordinary as to be unheard of, except by those who have been hurled out into the place of joyful, utter despair with themselves where they are finally allowing Jesus Christ to be Himself in them!"

Ask those who've experienced God's power (the energizer for doing good) from within and they'll readily agree to Jesus Christ's statement: "I am the vine; you are the branches. Those who remain in Me, and I in them, will produce much fruit. For apart from Me you can do nothing" JOHN 15:5 NLT.

Moreover, "Real goodness does not attach itself merely to this life — it points to another world. Political or professional reputation cannot last forever, but a conscience void of offense before God and man is an inheritance for eternity" DANIEL WEBSTER (1782-1852).

Finally, "The heart of a good man is the sanctuary of God" ANNE-LOUISE-GERMAINE DE STAËL (1766-1817).

In your own experience, doesn't it feel real good — refreshingly, exhilaratingly good — to be good and to do good?

Let's learn and enjoy the luxury of doing good.

Hunters

"T'S JUST PAST THOSE FISH PENS, WE'LL GET THERE SHORTLY!" ROSS HARPER-ALONSO SHOUTS TO ME OVER THE NOISE OF A CHUGGING ENGINE. IT IS MID-MORNING. WE ARE TRAVELING SOUTH OVER THE CALM WATERS OF LAKE TAAL, BATANGAS, EN ROUTE TO WHAT COULD BE A DAY OF SOME INTERESTING DISCOVERIES.

Ross and her colleagues are not in it for the money; they're just fascinated with the past.

"I've had my eye on this area for two years now," she tells me of the site we are about to visit. Sitting on a banca loaded with dive gear and with the members of an expedition team, one might think of this lady as a longtime expert in underwater archaeology. Ross, however, is far from being one. A 37-year-old writer/office manager and a mother of two, she is pretty much your usual urban dweller, but one with a passion for a not-so-usual activity: expedition diving. Ross and her colleagues are not in it for the money, either; they're just fascinated with the past.

Ross herself got her inspiration from the 1991 book by Dr. Thomas Hargrove, "The Mysteries of Taal," which offers an intriguing glimpse into the bleak past of the Batangueños.

Shards of Ming Dynasty china found in Taal Lake

Based on accounts by Augustinian missionaries, Ross relates, Taal Volcano's eruptions were violent, horrifying and deadly. Due to the eruption, the Pansipit River was blocked and the lake rose, invading the towns of Lipa and Tanauan. "Towns were relocated, and each time people moved they not only rebuilt their homes and new churches, but they erected stone walls to stop the rising." Today, the residents call these stone edifices, "sapao," man-made or natural passageways.

In Taal, searching for these sapao began as a wild goose chase. Every bangkero Ross has spoken to had his own version of either a sunken city, a church with a gold cross, and best of all, an entire community buried inside Crater Lake.

"I've always been a history buff for as far back as I can remember," notes the female adventurer. As a young girl, Ross remembers spending long hours in a relative's home, poring over old books and exploring the family's stash of antiques. A "hands-on approach" to learning history, she quickly realized, was much more fruitful than just listening to it classroom-style. Not long after, this lively interest

Visions of Atlantis: History buffs and weekend divers Third Alcantara, Dino Domingo and Ross Harper-Alonso scour Taal Lake for sunken towns

Tracking down Taal's mysteries:
Ross, Third and Mitzi Borromeo examine a rare find evolved into a deep passion for the real thing.

From a small, dusty attic in the city to a potential excavation site several miles away, one can only marvel at the lengths this obsession has taken her. Ross' expedition group is, in fact, composed of seven individuals who share the same penchant for exploration. Pooling their talents and resources together, they've founded the Philippine Underwater Archaeological Conservation Society Inc., a non-profit, non-stock organization dedicated to preserving such important finds. It all started when Ross tracked down diver Third Alcantara, whom she heard had been doing some diving in the lake, and turned him on to its possible mysteries. The society was formed in March last year.

We arrive at our destination an hour later, everyone eager to get started. Today's plan calls for a shore dive from the lake's southern coast, and then for a series of sweeping searches along the bottom, beneath some 130 feet of dark, murky Taal water.

"Of all places to mount an expedition, why'd you choose this particular lake?" I ask the members of the dive team. "There's a lot of mystery and folklore surrounding this body of water," Third explains. "Rumors of sunken towns are quite common here — you can ask any fisherman around and he'll tell you tales of obscure walls visible underwater at low tide."

"There could be a lot of truth to these claims, when you come to think of it," adds Dino Domingo, an experienced divemaster and underwater photographer. "Because of the volcanic nature of this area, many coastal settlements here have been built and abandoned throughout the centuries."

With their tanks checked and dive masks cleaned, the group sets out on its search. As I watch them from the coast, their wet-suited figures sticking out like a squad of grotesque, colorful frogmen, I think about the problems they've had to overcome to get here. The Lake Taal area's history, I was told, has barely been documented. Save for sketchy accounts and the fading memory of some old Batangueños, very few written records remain of this place. Even fewer maps exist, thus making the location of the buried settlements almost impossible to find.

"We found a submerged wall in a different location before, but it turned out to be just a natural formation," Third told me earlier. "If it hadn't been for some Spanish-era walls that we located further inland, we wouldn't have thought of searching this current site." Add to that the constant need for funds and supplies (luckily, Fedex, Nautilus Dive Shop and California Manufacturing Corporation sponsored this outing), and you get a group of people who are truly focused on their goal, no matter how hard it may be.

It is well past midday when the team surfaces. Judging from the look on their faces, the sweep isn't going well. Ross walks onto shore, a bunch of dead leaves hanging from her tank, followed by Dino who is clutching his pair of fins. Third comes in next, his wetsuit smeared with splotches of mud.

Paul Diano, the team's equipment specialist, saunters back, accompanied by the rest of the group — environmental worker Mitzi Borromeo and herpetologist Arvin Diesmos, both wildlife experts, and Randel Raymundo, a dive master/post production editor.

"Visibility is zero down there — I can't even see my hand in front of me!" Ross exclaims. The rest of them can only agree. In almost an hour spent underwater, they encountered little more than a thick soup of silt and some natural rocks. There was no man-made structures of any kind.

There are, however, some fruits of the morning's toil — several shards of white, glistening china, found by the team off the deep end. Last June, the team was joined by Dr. Bong Dizon of the National Museum. The Museum would later identify these shards as valuable Ming Dynasty pieces — proof, perhaps, of bigger discoveries to come. Indeed, Ross is far from discouraged. "This is only the beginning," she says of the Society's work, and is already setting her sights on the next lake to plunge into.

Due to the fast-approaching habagat winds, the dives in the following days are likewise called off. There will be no further expeditions in the coming weeks, possibly until the entire rainy season ends. In the meantime, Ross and her crew will have to be content with their finds, tantalizing promises of more clues to come. As of this writing, however, Ross and the team were set to bring some geologists to the site for a look-see, and she was looking forward to "watching them work!"

"I know it's disappointing, but that's the nature of an expedition," she tells me that night. "That's why we're doing this. Nothing is certain—we really don't expect to find anything so easily. We've still got a long way to go." She examines a ceramic slab she has been holding, her fingernail tracing the outline of what looks like the drawing of a dragon.

"I've always wanted to explore Lake Taal after I heard the rumors about it," Ross remarks with a smile. "You see, my dream is to shed light on its mysteries. I'd like to rediscover this rare cultural heritage, and if possible, preserve the lake and its archaeological treasures."

"Maybe then," she adds, "we can say that this passion of ours will have been for a good cause!"

WEEKEND

The Second Coming of Orly Ilacad

MEDICINE AND MUSIC HAVE ABSOLUTELY NOTHING IN COMMON. BUT IN THE LIFE OF ORLY ILACAD, MEDICINE AND MUSIC ARE WHERE HIS STORY BEGINS.

Orly, the man behind OctoArts and Virgin Café, was only 17 and in his second year of pre-med studies when his father died. The eldest of six children, he felt responsible for his mother, brother and sisters. With the intention of picking up where his father left off, Orly quit pre-med and shifted to commerce, "so I could graduate earlier, start earning and help my family."

After receiving his commerce degree from San Beda, Orly decided it was time to go into business and fulfill his promise. Together with his cousin Vic del Rosario (who would later become head of his own company, Viva Records), Orly founded a recording company they called Vicor, coined from their first names, Vic and Orly. The two cousins started Vicor with all of P6,000, holding office in a rented room in a building along Raon in Quiapo. Vic and Orly were a perfect foil for each other: the former was a shrewd businessman and risk taker, while Orly was his complete opposite, the cautious, conservative type who would think a hundred times before investing in a project. Between the two of them, he was also the one with a natural ear for music.

This Orly owed to his parents. Sunday evenings at the Ilacad residence in Pasay were reserved for impromptu jam sessions where his father Jose would play the accordion, and his mother Carmen the piano, while he and his siblings sang and played various instruments. Later, while in college, Orly formed his own band called Orly and the Ramrods where he played lead guitar. Along with rival Ramon Jacinto's RJ & the Riots, Orly and the Ramrods were quite popular. They even managed to record three albums.

By the time Orly and Vic founded Vicor in 1966, they knew enough about the music industry to steer the company in the right direction. Vicor was one of the most successful recording outfits of its time. It became a major force in the development of OPM (Original Pilipino Music) and the so-called Manila Sound. The company was a trendsetter, and for the longest time, it seemed that nothing could shake it from its position at the top, that is, until the two cousins decided to part ways. Asked why, Orly simply says: "I just wanted to go in a different direction."

From his experience in building up Vicor with his cousin, Orly had a clear vision of what he wanted to do with his own company. "I called my company OctoArts because I wanted to go into eight different fields, like recording, movies, live entertainment, music publishing, anything to do with the entertainment business. I even wanted to produce TV shows and specials. Noon kasi, usong-uso ang mga blocktimers sa TV."

"I called my company OctoArts because I wanted to go into eight different fields, like recording, movies, live entertainment, music publishing, anything to do with the entertainment, business"

Living it up with friends: With Manila Mayor Lito Atienza and Vina Morales, and with Mexican soap star Thalia

Roger Carpio

They say lightning never strikes twice, but it did, at least in Orly's lifetime. What he did with Vicor, he again did with OctoArts. A musician at heart, Orly had terrific instincts. He only had to listen to a singer once and could immediately tell whether he or she was capable of producing a hit and selling records. It was Orly's company that launched the careers of '70s jukebox queen Eva Eugenio, Cristy Mendoza (of "Isang Babalikan, Isang Liwanan" fame), The Boyfriends, Eddie Peregrina soundalike Bernie Gala; and, later, Pops Fernandez, Lea Salonga, Ogie Alcasid, Jamie Rivera, Dingdong Avanzado, rapper Francis Magalona, Michael V, Joey Albert and local rock band The Dawn. All of them were given the big break by OctoArts. "My Vicor experience and the friendships I established with industry people helped a lot during the early days of OctoArts," says Orly.

OctoArts was also the exclusive local distributor of major US labels like RCA, Arista, Motown and Columbia. It was during this period that OctoArts struck gold with Michael Jackson's "Thriller" which became one of the biggest-selling albums of all time, not just in the Philippines but worldwide. "We sold millions of copies of 'Thriller,'" recalls Orly.

Orly's winning streak continued when he ventured into movies with OctoArts Films. In Search of My Maternal Instinct

LAYING HOUSE AS A CHILD, I ALWAYS WANTED TO BE THE BABY, NEVER THE MOMMY OR THE TEENAGER. I HAVE ALWAYS BEEN THE KIND OF PERSON OTHER PEOPLE TAKE CARE OF, EVEN IF I'M THE ELDEST IN THE FAMILY. SO WHEN I DISCOVERED THE HORRENDOUS FLU I HAD BEEN NURSING FOR ALMOST TWO MONTHS WAS IN FACT PREGNANCY, I WAS BOTH PLEASED AND TERRIFIED. MOSTLY TERRIFIED, BECAUSE AT NO TIME IN MY PAST HAVE I EVER FELT ANY MATERNAL URGE.

(Editor's Note: We want to know what people are thinking these days. Tell us what's on your mind and in your heart. And no, you don't have to be under 30 or over 65 to contribute to this column. We welcome contributions from all ages.)

I couldn't escape the idea that having a baby meant being tied down and conforming to society's expectations. Being a mother meant putting away your playthings and playing house for real. That meant balanced meals and a balanced personality — all very scary and uncharted territory for me.

Needless to say, people were surprised when I announced I was pregnant. Some joked, "Are you serious?" Others were more blatant: "Are you scared? Aren't you worried about post-partum depression?" I wondered about the existence of maternal instinct when I read about teenage mothers leaving their babies in institutions. I wasn't horrified. I could imagine their fears, their terror at being solely responsible for a young life, and that worried me. I was afraid that if I made a mistake and turned out to be a bad parent my child would no doubt blame me.

With one exception, none of my close friends have children. I felt like a pioneer, especially since this would be the first grandchild in the family of my husband. The pressure was on. I couldn't help measuring myself up against other mothers, who always make it seem that pregnancy is a breeze, birthing a joy, and raising children a marvelous adventure. Children instinctively like and trust my mother. Not me; I have always been tongue-tied and awkward with children, because I feel they see right through me.

The third trimester began and I started to really worry. I had hoped that some marvelous miracle would happen and then I would wake up and have the maternal instinct, but it wasn't happening. I had hoped for the basketball-shaped stomach, the calm, serene smile and warm glow other mothers had. Instead I felt like I was pregnant from the neck down.

I felt lousy that it was my husband Philbert who was eager to go out and start preparing for the arrival of our baby. It was Philbert who let me drink juice instead of softdrinks and shoveled vegetables into my plate and wanted to talk baby names. Feeling low, I phoned my mother-in-law. After inquiring about my water retention and recent craving for pineapples, she asked, "So are you going on walks so that you won't have a hard time giving birth?" "All the time," I lied. I wanted her to tell me everything would be okay, but I didn't want to tell her the terrible truth — that I felt no upsurge of affection for the crib, or the little shoes. They always reminded me of doll shoes that I kept losing when I was a kid, and how I always wanted to play with other kids instead of Barbies.

It seemed that my body wasn't built for birthing either. I went into labor five days earlier than my due date, and had a relatively difficult birthing experience. It was 6 p.m. when I started feeling labor pains but I ignored it. By 10 p.m., I couldn't stand it anymore. I was admitted at 10:30 p.m. but by 12 p.m. the next day, my dilation was only 4 cm., so the doctor decided to open me up. My son came out at 2:48 p.m. Now, I thought, now, cry with joy. But I didn't. I couldn't. It was simply the surprise of seeing who it was that had been inside me, upside down and underwater, so that he was as purple and pointy as a crayon — it was the way my son looked at me, imprinting me on his brain. He seemed to look right into me, as if he knew me. It was the most terrifying and beautiful moment of my life, and it was gone like a soap bubble the minute my mind touched it.

Illustration by STEPH BRAVO

Philbert never left my side. He seemed so alive, vibrating the way the sun seems to when you stare at it too long. I was envious as I remembered how easily he had plucked Joshwa from his bassinet when he first settled in my room, the confident way he hugged him in his arms, pressing him gently against his chest. As he held Joshwa, I envisioned his heart tinier than my thumb, and his heart the size of his fist. He sat down in a chair with the baby in his arms and just gazed at him. "I have a son," he chuckled incredulously, his eyes sparkling with this new intimacy. He closed his eyes as if to savor the moment and in minutes he was asleep, with his son peacefully cradled in his arms. I lay there watching them with tears in my eyes.

I insisted on carrying Joshwa out of the hospital. After all, I was his mother. I wrapped both arms around him, clutching him to my chest.Flushed with endorphins, I felt fierce. I nearly shook with the anticipation that someone might try to tear him away from me.

After two months I discovered that I could differentiate between Joshwa's "I'm starving" cry and his "I need a diaper change" cry. I realized I had been learning his language. I wanted to understand him, to know him. Away from the world of other mothers' experiences and baby manuals, and in our own quiet way, we were bonding. The day's anxiety fled my body at his touch. I felt like he belonged to me — like I was truly his mother.

I confess I'm still not crazy about other children. But I can't explain how the weight of my son in my arms calms me, sustains me, and sometimes makes me deliriously happy. I'm not convinced that every woman has a maternal instinct, but I do believe that we are all born with the capacity to love and nurture. I can tell you that sometimes when I am out on the street without Joshwa I feel a sharp pang of loss that makes me stop and catch my breath, and I wonder if that isn't my maternal instinct stretching its wings a bit. And though I still can't believe I already have a son, it's not because it doesn't feel right, but because I can't believe my good fortune.

Painting the TOWNS Red

Women achievers have enough cause to celebrate; they're in good company, and getting better

A FUNNY THING HAPPENED TO MARINE BIOLOGIST DR. HELENA TIMBOL-YAP ON HER WAY TO GETTING HER TOWNS AWARD FOR SCIENCE IN 1998. "I WAS IN THE AIRPORT, NEWLY ARRIVED, WITH NO ONE TO PICK ME UP," RECALLS THIS PIONEER IN CORAL TRANSPLANTATION AND GROWTH. "I CALLED HOME AND MY MOM TOLD ME I WON." BUT BECAUSE SHE JUST HAD A SEVERE INJURY FROM DIVING AND WAS MORE WORRIED ABOUT GETTING A RIDE HOME, THE NEWS DID NOT REGISTER, SHE RECOUNTS.

Indeed, getting recognized for excelling in their field is the last thing on the mind of Yap and others like her who have been named The Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service (TOWNS).

If anything, the prestigious award serves as "an affirmation, a pat on the back spurring you to greater commitment to change the situation. Nabigyan ng panibagong sigla." confides Corazon Juliano Soliman, 1992 TOWNS awardee for Agrarian Reform and Community Development. "The value of the award is not as important as what you do for the people," says Soliman, the current Social Welfare Secretary.

Just as self-effacing is Philippine National Red Cross governor Rosa Rosal, who won the award in 1974 for Humanities. While others similarly recognized would quickly parlay their fame into political capital, this Ramon Magsaysay Awardee has steered clear of elective positions, preferring to work without fanfare or thought of gain. Serving the Red Cross without any salary, she has even donated the US$50,000 RM award money toward the education of 82 scholars so far.

For Lisa Macuja, the award is a personal vindication. "I cried when I learned I won the TOWNS," says this 1989 awardee for Performing Arts. "I remembered my Lola being totally against my dancing ballet, but the award assured me I made the right choice. I felt like a little kid getting straight A's."

First conceived in 1974, the TOWNS' luster has been further burnished by its choice of awardees these 25-odd years, among them Lea Salonga, Dr. Perla Santos Ocampo, former Sen. Leticia Shahani, pianists Cecil Licad and Ingrid Santamaria, stage director Zeneida Amador, advertising creative director Edwina Koch Arroyo, editor Leticia Magsanoc, print journalists Rina David and Paulynn Sicam, actress Nora Aunor, singer Celeste Legaspi, Labor Secretary Patricia Sto. Tomas, bowling champion Bong Coo, broadcast journalists Cheche Lazaro, Loren Legarda and Mel Tiangco, lawyer Lorna Kapunan, and advertising leader Yolly Ong.

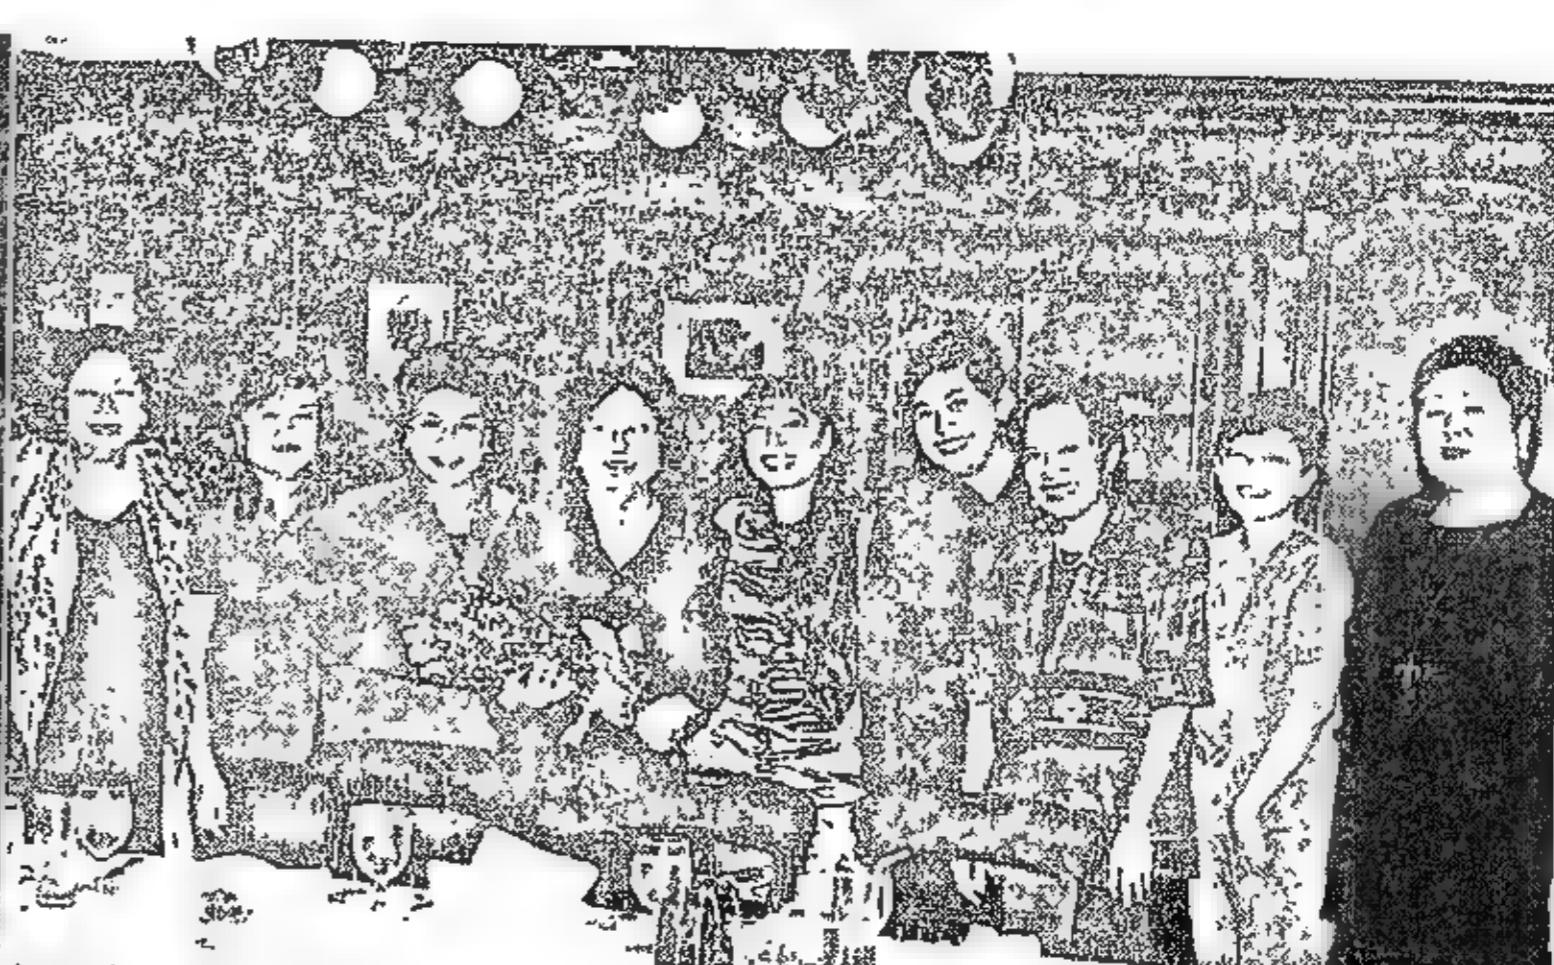

Other women achievers between the age of 21 and 45 and who exhibit the same pioneering zeal and commitment are invited to join the TOWNS roster. Nomination forms are available at the TOWNS Secretariat, 20th Floor, West Tower, Philippine Stock Exchange Building, or call Ada Mabbayah at 637-4261 and 637-4262. Deadline for submission of nominations is July 31.

Traffic from Hell

Some Filipinos cite Manila's chaotic streets as an indication that the country is not yet ready for US-style democracy, and should instead have a Lee Kuan Yew at the helm

IN THE YEARS BEFORE WORLD WAR II, FILIPINOS DROVE ON THE LEFT RATHER THAN THE RIGHT-HAND SIDE OF THE ROAD, AS IS STILL THE PRACTICE IN MOST OF ASIA AND AUSTRALIA. TRAFFIC POLICE WERE STATIONED AT STRATEGIC INTERSECTIONS LIKE PLAZA GOITI AND ON THE ESCOLTA, IN ELEGANT LITTLE KIOSKS WITH PARASOL ROOFS. THEY WORE NEAT WHITE GLOVES AND RATHER OFFICIAL LOOKING TROPICAL PITH HELMETS. TRAFFIC JAMS WERE NOT UNKNOWN BUT THE AIR WAS FRESH AND MERALCO'S ELECTRIC TRANVIAS MADE IT EASY TO TRAVEL AROUND THE CITY, WHICH IN PREWAR YEARS HAD A POPULATION OF LESS THAN ONE MILLION.

But times have changed and Manila's traffic and resulting pollution now rivals the worst to be found anywhere in the world.

Increasingly frustrated Manila drivers take it upon themselves to jump lanes and "counter flow" on the left when bumper to bumper congestion drives them to breaking point. Naturally the result is gridlock, road rage and threat to life and limb. Taxis, jeepneys, and macho motorists of both genders make a mad dash against oncoming traffic. As the number of vehicles steadily increases so do the motorists' headaches and frazzled nerves.

Intrepid drivers sail through red lights and stop signs with no regard for traffic cops or crossing traffic. Taxis and jeepneys make U-turns wherever it suits them or when it is physically possible. Even the few remaining sidewalks are fair game to motorcycles and ubiquitous motorbikes delivering pizzas, hamburgers and French fries delicately scented with carbon monoxide and flavored with a drizzle of motor oil.

During daylight hours buses and jeepneys rule the roads throughout the city, stopping to load or unload passengers wherever it suits them and bullying any hapless motorist who gets in their way. The older vehicles belch black smoke into the faces of their passengers and Manila's benighted pedestrians. At 9 in the evening, trucks and private jeepneys come out to turn the daytime chaos into a more sinister game. Archaic vehicles with a haphazard array of lights or none at all, lurch onto the roadways overloaded with every imaginable cargo. Trucks loaded with squealing pigs, chickens and other livestock arrive from the provinces along with jeeps stacked to the roof with coconuts, pineapples, bananas and other produce. These must contend with burly flatbed trucks hauling construction materials or trailing pipes and steel bars, or weighed down with any number of cargo containers enroute to or from North Harbor.

For the private motorist, the challenge is not to get squeezed between the contending trucks, overloaded jeeps and buses and at the same time be constantly on the lookout for the horrendous potholes as well as chunks of concrete and metal debris that tend to appear from nowhere. This is especially true during the rainy season. The worst luck is for motorists to be squeezed against an antiquated garbage truck freely spewing its fetid liquids onto the night streets of the city.

As if the traffic were not challenging enough, pedestrians are forced to hurl themselves into the traffic at major intersections for want of even rudimentary sidewalks or safe crosswalks. To add to the malevolent ambiance, men casually line up facing the walls, irrigating them. Children and vendors scamper between cars, hawking their wares, and leading the blind, the crippled and the aged in hopes of a bit of human charity.

The end result is a chaotic free-for-all on the roadways and streets of Manila. Conservative friends have often told me, "You know naman Jonathan, us Filipinos are not really ready for the democratic freedoms you enjoy in America." They often cite the traffic chaos as an example and pine for the iron hand of a Lee Kuan Yew or, God forbid, a return to martial law. As an American and also an admirer of the Filipino common man, I bristle at this. My usual cryptic answer is, "When have the average Filipinos ever been offered American style freedom and democracy? And why is it that, with all our 'unbridled' democratic freedom in America, people scrupulously obey traffic regulations?"

(J. Best Collection)

The answer is simple. In most democracies, people elect legislators who write strict traffic laws and elect executives who enforce them. Citizens obey the laws or suffer heavy fines, have their vehicles impounded or go to jail. All of this is standard operating procedure even in the most liberal states in America. The millions of law-abiding Filipino workers living in the United States have no problem adjusting to this. It is taken for granted in America that public servants and elected officials should provide essential public services and ensure public safety, as well as protect public property such as sidewalks, parks and open spaces.

If current traffic laws were strictly enforced in Manila there would be a hue and cry from macho road warriors and those delightful types who use ambulances as private limousines. Jeepney and bus drivers might actually go on strike for a few days and the police would legitimately demand more pay. Bribes would be offered to arresting officers left and right. A few high profile sting operations with glaring presentations to media of handcuffed perpetrators and handcuffed corrupt officials would put an end to that.

Filipinos have a great talent for adjusting to new situations and after the initial shock people would start obeying the laws, fixing defective vehicles and breathing a little easier. Everyone would quietly curse those damn traffic cops as they nervously glance at their rear view mirrors. The sight of "meter maids" and roving tow trucks hauling off illegally parked cars would strike panic in the hearts of illegal parkers. Motorists would complain bitterly about the punitive fines and weeks of public service meted out in traffic court for moving violations. Hey, welcome to the free world!
